To the Right Honourable Father of Arts and Arms,

CHARLES LORD HOWARD,

Baron of Effingham, Earl of Nottingham, High Constable of the Castle, and Forrest of Windsor, Lord chief Justice in Eyre of England, Governour and Captain Generall of all her Majesties Maritime Forts and Castles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Sussex and Surrey, Knight of the most Noble Order of the Garter, and One of her Majesties most Honourable privie Councell.

Right Honourable,

THere is a saying in Zenophon most worthy the citing and insight; that matters of worth and consequence are both to be committed and commended to their trust and protection, who know the w ight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the same by authoritie and Reason. For this cause, and upon this ground, I have chosen your Honour out for a most noble Patron of this most famous and accomplished Historie of the Jewes: which (for dignitie and antiquitie of the subject, the elegancie and puritie of the style, the choise proprietie of copious words, the gravitie and varietie of Sentences, the alterations and memorable Events; and lastly, for the birth and dignitie of the Authour) requireth a spirit of no less wisedome, courage, and nobilitie than your self, who have power to defend, and knowledge to discern the worth thereof. Vouchsafe therefore to levell the eye of your [illegible] upon the Center of this happie Historie: and as Themistocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophees; and Alexander in seeing Achilles Tombe, did grievously sigh with an honourable emulation: so let the zeal, magnanimitie, and admirable constancy which every where affronteth you in this Book (and ravisheth the best minds from the boundless troubles of this world, and draweth them into the contemplation of true perfection) so settle your honourable love and affection to emulate the same, that as for glory in Arms; so for preserving and protecting Arts, you may outstrip your competitors, and amaze too curious expectation. And in mine opinion the time challengeth no less at your hands: for as your transcendent dignitie and courage hath returned us an happie harvest in our expected and long possessed peace, as by your second care and diligence next under her sacred Majestie, we all reap the fruit and felicitie of blessed abundance: so by your example in reading and respecting both learning, and the learned, you shall pull down that Babel, which confused ignorance hath raised to over-reach industry; yea, you shall strengthen the weakned ability of learning which (alas the while) is now-adays like a commoditie without request, scarce saleable by the hands of a cunning Broker. Nothing is more worth money, and less in request: onely the worlds blind creatures (as S. Hierom termeth them) the unlettered take delight in their errors, whose writings (as Plutarch speaketh of Aristophanes Poem) are written for no moderate mans pleasure. Let therefore your upright estimation of this work (most noble Earl) awaken the dead devotion of such as contemn Arts; and let no such corrupt drones (as made sale of unfull thoughts for good merchandise) buz about the hive of true science: But as Emperours, Kings, and Princes have ever in their Greek, Italian and French, with a respective acceptance, and bountifull hand, entertained this History; so let this translation of Josephus which courteth you now in English, be accepted at your hands, and countenanced by your Honour: for whose unconfined felicitie both I, and other of my name have ever prayed, and will never cease to studie.

Your Honours unfainedly devoted,

THOMAS LODGE.

TO THE COVRTEOUS READER,

As touching the uſe and abuſe of Hiſtorie.

IF Hiſtorie were as eaſily conceited and made uſe of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the government of mans life; I ſhould hold it no ſin, ſo preciſely to preſcribe a limitation and bound, to ſuch as ſhould enter the Liſt, and conſult with example: for what more pleaſing to our ſelves, or profitable for ſocieties could ever befall us, then in this Theater of mans life, (wherein Hiſtorie affordeth all ſorts of Actors) to ſit and learn prevention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wiſe by forraign wrecks? All which being traduced to our private uſe, we may either as partners in what we have paſt, or obſervers of future caſualties by precedent events, tie ages to our memories; and preventing our eſcapes, by ſurvey of other mens repentance, briefly beget experience by ſight, or foreſight of worldly caſualties, and form a mirrour of fore-paſſed errors, to forejudge our future calamities. But for that it behoveth us to enter this worldly Academy the more prepared, the more that Hiſtorie is fraught and filled full with plentifull fruit: and whereas the difficulty and difference is alike, to yeeld an upright verdict both of a mans own, and other mens life; neither may any man rightly examine another (how wiſe ſoever he be) except in equall ballance he weigh his own imperfections; it muſt neceſſarily follow on both ſides, that with the more wiſedom, and the greater obſervation we ought to intertain Hiſtory, leſt our mind like the wind ſhould wander uncertainly, and our devotion ſhould prevent our reſolution; our eſteem, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furniſhed and affluent banquet; although ſome things, (and they to few men) ſeem pleaſant, otherſome to other are without taſte and ſeem tart, and every one judgeth his meat not by proof, but by the palate; yet notwithſtanding there is a certain mean, which either Natures ordinary, or the refined kind of nutriment (being ſimple and incorrupt) hath faſhioned and fixed for moſt apteſt for the body; from which, whoſoever varieth, or either beyond meaſure, or without judgement, followeth his fooliſh appetite, in glutting himſelf beyond diſcretion, reapeth more incommoditie then pleaſure by theſe pleaſures: So in the diverſitie of mans life, although a thouſand forms, a thouſand ſimilitudes be offered, and that every man faſhioneth other mens manners to his mind, yet there is but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whoſoever tracteth with judgement, doth truely know the uſe of life; whereas they that ſit in a plentifull banquet, in affecting all things, can make uſe of nothing. Now how many are there, I pray you, that in reſpect of either of their own, or other mens facts and words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choice in judging minds, then meats, and that in this matter ſeemeth not ſufficiently inſtructed? Wherein I wonder that men eſpie not their errors, whereas they imagine that Hiſtory is the inſtructor of ſuch as read the ſame; whereas it onely yieldeth matter of inſtruction, even as the banquet miniſtreth meat according to every mans affection. Some therefore are ſeduced with the ſweetneſs of the Stile, and in ſeeking their pleaſure, loſe their profit; who reap no other fruit of Hiſtory then to beguile time, and beget officious idleneſſe, laughing away houres, and not repent: others in reading, glory, hunt it in a ſhadow, where if they could make uſe of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aſpire to true glory without true vertue, neither no wiſe man will hope further: yet ſee we many men, that because they have read many excellent works, will be Capricious and pretend wiſedom; reſembling thoſe Tragedians, who will, after they have diſcharged themſelves of their parts and appar-

wherein they counterfaited the Emperour, yet retain his Royall and Princely manners: Some triviall and light witted, that made an Eclipſe of a ſhadow, make more of the embleme then the work; the habit then the Doctor: ſo admirall effects worketh Hiſtorie in mens minds. Now whereas it is the moſt exact and chiefeſt intent of Hiſtorie to awaken mens idleneſs, and arm them againſt caſualties, and the whole bent of example hath no other iſſue; it falleth out through mens ſecuritie (who ſuppoſe that their neighbours perils concern them not) that whatſoever is of note, is overſlipt with a deaf and ſleeping judgement; and things that memorie ſhould beſt love, are loſt in her. To conclude, there are ſome that will have every mans ſhooe fitted on their own Laſt, and tie all mens pens to their own pleaſures: for which cauſe, partly by reaſon of this ſecret, partly through this ill ordered, and confuſed and raſh method of reading, as of corrupt humours, ſo their is grown a certain Κακοξιλια of judgement and reſolution: and as in temperate bodies, meat yieldeth very little profit; ſo reap they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maiſt eaſily conceive, how a Hiſtorie ought to be read: how mens lives ought in themſelves to be examined: finally how equall a proportion is required in both. And truely in my opinion, the chiefeſt ground of this difficultie, is the perverſneſs of our judgements: which is the cauſe, we therather reſpect our own inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no leſſe miſery then the former, that ſuch as write, ſet down ſuch things as are acted, not onely for our profit ſake, but to feed their own humours: and like to certain Architects, (by interpoſing their judgements) do vainly praiſe ſome things, ſuppoſing that our imitation ſhould be tied to their pleaſure; where, if they performed what they ought to do, the Reader ſhould encounter with no ſuch diſtractions: but now in like manner as Cooks, who rather reſpect their maſters pleaſurable taſte, then his profit; would God the Hiſtoriographer did not affect flatterie. It therefore appeareth that in two ſorts (firſt in our own judgement; and next, to the prejudice of thoſe that write) we are circumvented in that they ſet not down ſuch events as paſs in their own nature, and as they are. For he that writeth an Hiſtorie, is the Interpreter of thoſe things that are paſt: whoſe judgement being depraved, it fareth with them as with the pureſt and moſt richeſt wine, which waxeth muſtie by reaſon of that veſſell wherein it is incloſed, or is by ſophiſtication corrupted: which is the greateſt folly, and moſt intollerable deceit that may befall men. They therefore who negligently undertake a Hiſtorie, (or ſuppoſe that life were to be paſt raſhly, and without an exact obſervance of all offices,) are no leſs deceived then certain countrey peſants in the laſt troubles in France (of whoſe folly I drew ſome example) who attempting and entering upon a Citie not far off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries ſhop furniſhed with all kind of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleaſure, odours and delight of the confections they taſted; and ſuppoſing all to be of the ſame kind, devoured, taſted, and ſwallowed down every thing: whereupon ſome fell ſick of feavers, ſome grew phrenſie, and many loſt their lives to pleaſe their appetites; at leaſtwiſe, he that ſcaped beſt, gave occaſion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, ſo Hiſtorie (the image of life) is fraught with pleaſure, and diſpleaſure; and only in the uſe of life, the wiſedome of life conſiſteth.

Farewell: uſe this, and my ſelf, as two twins born for thy profit.

Thine, THOMAS LODGE.

For the better understanding of the Coines and Measures, whereof there is some mention made in this Historie; observe I pray you that which followeth.

SAth was a measure containing about some seven pints French.
The Epha contained three Saths.
The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to say thirty Saths, and was the same measure both in drie and liquid things.
The Log contained a French measure.
The Hin contained twelve Logs.
The Bath contained as much as the Epha.
The Cad was a kind of Pitcher containing such a quantitie as a young Maiden might well carry.
The common Sicle contained the weight of foure ounces, whether it were of Gold, silver, or any other Metall.
The sacred or holy Sicle weighed half an ounce of any metall whatsoever.
The common Sicle of silver was valued at about some shilling of our money.
The holy Sicle of silver was valued at about some two shillings.
The common Drachme was the eighth part of an ounce.
The sacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.
The Pound weighed twelve ounces.
The ordinary Talent contained fiftie four pounds, eight ounces and a quarter of Troy waight in any Metall: yet it was not currant money, but a masse made up after the manner of an ingot
The sacred Talent contained one hundreth pounds.
Furthermore, note this for your better knowledge, that when as Josephus quoteth the Olympiades without any specification of the years therein contained, he ordinarily comprehendeth the space of four years compleat.
Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath divers significations amongst both Greeks and Latins, (as the controversie between Plinie and Diodorus Siculus may well testifie) and for that divers of our English Translators have sometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong; I pray you in reading this Historie, whereas any of these words occure, suppose them for one and the same measure of ground, and according to the Greeks account, (which I suppose Josephus most respected in this Historie) conclude it to be either of 600. foot as the Olympique, that is of 120. pases, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foot, that is 200. pases. As for the furlong, either multiply him 8 times to make him a Stade, or as an oversight in the Printing, it passe with the Errata.

Jane THE Bowler.

FIRST BOOK

Jane OF THE MOST Bowler

Ancient History of the Jews:

Written by Joseph the son of Matthias.

A most excellent Preface, containing the causes which induced the Author to write this History, together with the contents and intents of the same.

CHAP. I.

THey that indeavour themselves to write Histories, seem not (in my opinion) to have one and the same intent and motive, but divers and very different causes of their labours: for some of them are addicted to this study, under pretence to exemplifie their eloquence, and under hope to purchase glory thereby; othersome to the end to give them content, whose worthy actions they couch and comment in their writings, have intermitted no time, nor (to their power) spared to labour. Some there are that having been present in person, and eye-witnesses in the execution of great affairs, have necessarily been inforced to reduce and digest the same in writing: neither wanted there some, who seeing occurrences of high and necessary consequence (which otherwise had been buried in ignorance) have been incited (in respect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publishing thereof: now of these forenamed causes, the two last are they that incited me to the like. For the warre which we had with the Romanes, and the accidents and issues on both parts, (all which in person I beheld, and to my peril I have learned) do compel me to declare the same; and the rather, for that there are some, who in their writings, have depraved, and perverted the truth. I have therefore taken this work in hand, for that in my opinion, the knowledge thereof will be both pleasing and profitable to the Græcians: for it shall contain the antiquity of our whole Nation, their form of Common-weale, both translated and gathered out of the antiquities and chronicles of the Hebrewes. Truth it is, that heretofore and at such time also as I composed the History of the foresaid warre, I had projected and purposed with my self, to lay open to the world, how and whence the Jewes had their first original, what alterations in fortune they had falne into, by what law-maker they had been instructed in piety, and incited to the exercise of vertue: how many warres have they sustained by long and divers manes, and finally how against their will they have been intangled in this last warre, which they waged against the Romanes. But for that the content of this matter, who too ample and copious, I have separated it apart, assigning thereunto this Treatise accomplished from the beginning even to the end; afterwards in processe of time (as it usually happeneth to those that attempt matters of mighty consequence) I was surprized with a certain delay and slothfulnesse, that withdrew me from the translation of so weighty a matter, in an unfamiliar and forrain language. Yet some there were, who inflamed with a desire of knowledge, animated me in this action; and especially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured of all learning, learning, and who in ſpecial, took it for a pleaſure, to take knowledge of the divers occurrences of Common-weales: as he that had been agent, in divers affairs of importance, and ſundry accidents, in all which he hath ſhewed a marvellous magnanimity of courage, with an unmovable reſolution to follow vertue Being thus perſwaded by him, who is accuſtomed to incourage thoſe unto good actions, whom he perceiveth to be apt and prepared to perform things profitable and honeſt: and (that which is more) being aſhamed in my ſelf, that I ſhould rather take delight to follow idleneſſe, than addict my ſelf to any laudable exerciſe; I enforced my ſelf more couragiouſly then before-time; and (beſides all that which hath been ſpoken) I have effectually conſidered with my ſelf, that our anceſtors have thought good to communicate and publiſh the knowledge of our hiſtories to the Grecians, if ſo be that any of them were curious to underſtand the ſame. I have found therefore that Ptolomey king of Egypt the ſecond of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and deſirous to ſtore and gather books) was earneſtly deſirous, that our law and the rules thereof, and the preſcript form of our living ſhould be tranſlated into the Greek tongue. And as touching the high Prieſt Eleazar (who hath not been ſecond in vertue to any other whatſoever) he refuſed not to make the ſaid king partaker of the effect of his deſire: to which he had wholly contradicted, had it not been the ordinary courſe of our anceſtors, not to conceal from other men, what thing ſoever was honeſt. For which cauſe I have held it a matter no wayes undecent for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that ſame great ſacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (onely in as much as concerned learning) I ſuppoſed many alſo to be no leſſe affected to good letters, then the king: for he undertook not to have all the writings which we had, but thoſe tranſlators who were ſent unto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that unto him which was in our law. But thoſe things that are found written in the ſacred books of holy Scripture are infinite, being ſuch as contain in them, the hiſtory of five thouſand years: in which divers unexpected chances, ſundry fortunes of warre, and many changes of politick eſtates are diſcovered. In ſum, if any one have a deſire to read this hiſtory, he ſhall principally learn and apprehend, that all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation to thoſe men, who obſerve the will of God, and are afraid to tranſgreſſe the Lawes of his Commandements; and that God hath prepared for ſuch the crown and reward of felicity. Contrariwiſe, if they ſhall depart from the diligent obſervance thereof, that which is eaſie ſhall be made impoſſible, and their endeavours in their opinion good, ſhall end in incurable calamities. For which cauſe I exhort all thoſe that ſhall read theſe books, to fix their mind upon God, and that they approve our Law-maker, if (as it worthily deſerved) he hath conſidered the divine nature; and attributed to the ſame ſuch actions as are alwayes agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanity of fables, wherewith others are poyſoned; although in reſpect of the length of time, and the antiquity of things, he might without controul feign and imagine whatſoever vanities: for he was born more then two thouſand years ago, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durſt referre the original of their gods; neither the deeds or lawes of men, whereof they make mention. But in purſuit of our hiſtory, the ſequel of our diſcourſe, ſhall declare all things exactly, and in convenient order. For in compiling this work, I have promiſed to adde nothing, neither to pretermit any thing: and for that all whatſoever we ſhall declare, doth almoſt wholly depend on the wiſdome of our Law-maker Moſes; it is neceſſary before all other things, that I ſpeak ſomewhat of himſelf, leſt perhaps any man ſhould wonder how this labour having been enterpriſed, to diſcover the words and works of certaine perſons, is alſo imployed for the greateſt part in deſcribing and diſcovering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moſes thought it moſt eſpecially neceſſary, either for him that will rightly diſpoſe his life, or impoſe Laws to other men, that firſt and in eſpecial he have the knowledge of the nature of God; to the end that conceiving in his mind the greatneſſe of his works; he might as much as in him lieth, imitate his moſt unequal example; and follow him with all diligence. For it is impoſſible, that a Law-maker being void of this contemplation, ſhould have good ſenſe; or that his writings ſhould be of any moment to induce them unto vertue, who ſhould receive thoſe lawes, except before all things they ſhould learn, that God who is the Father, and Lord of all, and that ſeeth all, giveth happy life unto thoſe that follow him; and contrariwiſe invironeth them with great calamities, who forſake the way of vertue and righteouſneſſe. Moſes therefore intending to inſtruct his Citizens in this doctrine, began not his Ordinances with the Treatiſe of contracts and covenants, which we practiſe one with another, as

A other law-makers were accuſtomed to do: but he hath lifted their ſpirits on high, to the end they might think on God, and on the ornament of this world made by him, perſwading that the moſt accompliſhed work among all thoſe things which God had made in the world was the creation of us men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety; then might he more eaſily perſwade them in the reſt: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themſelves unto fables, have in their diſcourſe impoſed on their gods the infamy of ſinnes committed by men, and by that means have brought to paſſe, that the wicked ſort are yet more wicked and addicted to evil doing. But as touching our law-maker, after he had declared that God had in himſelf all vertue pure and unſpotted, he hath thought good that men alſo ſhould endeavour themſelves to be partakers of the ſame, and on thoſe that
B neither conceive nor believe thoſe things, he inflicteth a grievous and inexorable puniſhment: I exhort the Reader therefore to examine our writings according to this maxime: for to thoſe that conſider after this manner, nothing ſhall ſeem either abſurd or unworthy the magnificence of God; by reaſon that all things have their diſpoſition conformable to the univerſal nature, which our law-maker hath declared ſometimes obſcurely, ſometimes in convenient allegories gravely; and otherwiſe expreſſing that manifeſtly, and publiſhing that in plain words, which he ought openly to make known. The cauſes whereof if any man would ſearch, he might find a moſt deep and very philoſophical contemplation; which I overſlip at this preſent, without longer ſtaying thereon: but if God ſhall give me time, I will inforce my ſelf to compoſe it in a volume, as ſoon as I ſhall have finiſhed this work. For
C this preſent then I will apply my ſelf, to expoſe thoſe things which have been done, beginning at the creation of the world, according as Moſes hath ſpoken, and I have found it written in the holy Scriptures, which teſtifie and intreat to this effect as followeth.

CHAP. II.

The creation of the world.

IN the beginning God created heaven and earth. Now the earth not being ſubject to ſight, but covered with thick darkneſſe, and traverſed with an air coming from high: God commanded that there ſhould be light; and after the light
D was made, having conſidered the univerſal matter, he ſeparated the light from the darkneſſe, and named the darkneſſe night, and the light day; calling the morning the beginning of the day, and the evenning the time wherein we ceaſe from travel, and this was the firſt day which Moſes in his language called a day, whereof at this preſent I could give a ſufficient reaſon: but for that in a particular diſcourſe I have promiſed to write the general cauſes of all; I will referre the declaration thereof, to his convenient time and place. After this, the ſecond day, he placed the heaven above all the world, and having ſeparated it from other things, he thought good to give it a place apart; and making it firm by the means of a cryſtalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moiſt and rainy, and did harmoniouſly accord the earth with it, to the end the increaſe thereof ſhould be watered
E by dews. The third day, he firmly eſtabliſhed the earth, ſpreading the ſea round about the ſame; and the ſame day, he with a word cauſed all plants and ſeeds to ſpring upon the face of the earth. The fourth day, he embelliſhed the heavens with the ſunne, the moon and the ſtarres, ordaining them their motions and courſes by which the ſeaſons orderly enſuing, might be diſtinguiſht. In the fifth day, he made all kind of living creatures which dwell upon the face of the earth, as well they that ſwim in the deepeſt waters, as thoſe that flie in the air; uniting them together by couples and pairs, to the end that each in their kind might increaſe and multiply. The ſixth day, he made all four-footed beaſts, and diſtinguiſht them into male and female: and in the ſame day, he formed man. So that Moſes ſaith, that the world and all that is therein was made in ſix whole daies, and that on the Seventh day, God
F took reſt and ceaſed from his labours. By reaſon whereof we likewiſe deſiſt from travel on that day, which we call Sabbath, which is to ſay, repoſe.

After the ſeventh day, Moſes began to deſcribe the original of man, and the manner of his creation in theſe tearms: God framed man of the duſt of the earth, and poured into him a ſpirit and ſoul, which man was called Adam, an Hebrew word ſignifying ruddy, becauſe he was made of earth, tempered with red or yellow: for the earth which is rightly called a virgin, that is to ſay, earth not removed but elementary, is of that colour. Then brought God all kind of living creatures before Adam, ſhewing him as well the male as the female: on whom Adam beſtowed thoſe names, which to this preſent time they retain. And seeing that Adam had no female to accompany and live with him (for as yet there was no woman) and for that he thought it strange that all other living creatures had their companions: God took one of his ribs from him at such time as he slept, and of the same he formed a woman; who being brought before Adam, he did acknowledg that she was made for him. Now in Hebrew a woman is called Isha, but this was called Eva, which is as much to say, as the mother of all living creatures. He declareth also, that God planted in the East a garden, flourishing and adorned with all sorts of plants, amongst which was the tree of life, and another the tree of intelligence, by which was known both good and evill. And after he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to keep and cherish the plants. Now this garden is watered by a river that invironeth the whole earth, which divideth it self into four channels or rivers. That which is called Phison (which name signifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the land of India, and entreth into the great sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tigris, they flow into the red sea. Euphrates is called Phora (that is to say, dispersion or flower.) Tigris is called Diglat (which signifieth streight and swift.) Gehon runneth by the countrey of Egypt, and signifieth as much as coming from the East: the Greeks call it Nilus. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eat of the fruits of all other plants, and that they should abstain from that of science; telling them, that at what time soever they should taste of the same, they should dye the death. Whereas then at that time, all living creatures were at accord one with another; the serpent conversing with Adam and his wife, was inflamed with envy, for that he saw they should be happy, if they continued in the observation of Gods commandements; and that contrariwise, they should cast themselves headlong into ruine and destruction, if they should disobey the same. He therefore maliciously perswaded the woman, to taste the fruit of the tree of intelligence, giving her to understand, that the knowledg of good and evil was in the same; and that as soon as they had tasted thereof, they should lead a life no lesse happy then Gods: and by this means he caused the woman to fall, which took no regard of the ordinance of God. For having her self tasted of this fruit, and finding it pleasant and delicious in taste, she perswaded her husband also to taste the same: at which time they understood that they were naked, and sought means to cover themselves: (for this fruit had in it self, the vertue to give understanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then covered they themselves with fig leaves; which they put before their privities, esteeming themselves more happy then they were before, in that they had found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who beforetime was accustomed familiarly to talk with him) finding himself guilty of sinne, hid himself from his presence: but God wondring hereat, asked him for what cause he fled and shunned him at that time, whereas before time he had taken pleasure to talk familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had transgressed the ordinances and commandments of God, answered him not a word, but God spake unto him after this manner: I had provided for you the means whereby you might have led your life without sufferance of any evil, or sense of any misery: so that all whatsoever was requisite for necessity or pleasure, might happen of it self unto you, by my onely providence, without any travel or care on your parts; which if you had well used, age had not so soon overtaken you, but that you might have lived many yeers: but thou hast scorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandments. For in that thou art silent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of evil; of which thou findest thy self culpable: wherefore both old age shall quicklier come upon thee, and the dayes of thy life shall be shortned. Adam excused his sinne, and required at Gods hands, that he would not be incensed against him, laying the fault of that which had hapned on his wife, alledging that he had offended by reason he was suborned by her: and the woman accused the serpent. But at that time God punished him, because he had suffered himself to be overcome by the counsel of a woman; that the earth thence forward never more of her own accord should bring forth fruit: but that when they had travelled and almost devoured themselves in labour, it should sometimes give them food, and at other times refuse to sustain them. And as touching Eve, he chastised her with child-bearing, and throwes in travel; for that being her self deceived by the serpent, she had drawn her husband by the same means into extream misery. He took also from the serpent his voice, and was displeased against him; * by reason of the malice he had conceived against Adam, and he put venome on his tongue, declaring him an enemy both to man and woman; whom he commanded to bruise the head of the serpent, as well for that the evil which chanced unto men, consisted in the head, as also in that being assaulted in that part, he is most easily done to death. Moreover, having deprived him

CHAP. III.

Of the poſterity of Adam: and of the ten ages even unto the deluge.

Hedio and Ruffinus. cap. Gen. 4. v. 1, 2. Of Cain and Abel brethren.

BUt Adam and Eve had two male children, the firſt whereof was called Cain (which ſignifieth acquiſition) and the ſecond was called Abel (which is as much to ſay as mourning) they had alſo daughters. Theſe brothers addicted themſelves each
B one of them to their particular exerciſes. Abel the younger honoured juſtice, and (ſuppoſing that God was preſent in all his actions) he alwaies and wholly fixed his thoughts on vertue: and his exerciſe was keeping of ſheep. But Cain (being the wickedeſt man amongſt men, and addicted to unſatiable deſire of profit) was he that firſt found out the uſe of the plough, and who killeth his brother for the cauſe which enſueth. Having concluded among themſelves to ſacrifice unto God, Cain offered the fruits of his labour, and planting; Abel preſented milk. and the firſtlings of his fold: which ſacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather conſiſted of things produced of themſelves by the order of nature, then that which a covetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from nature. Hereupon Cain (being wroth, becauſe his brother Abel was more honoured by God then himſelf) ſlew his bro-
C ther; and having hidden his body out of ſight, he thought that ſuch a murther ſhould be concealed. But God knowing well this fact, appeared to Cain, and queſtioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many daies ſince he had not ſeen him; when as heretofore he had alwaies ſeen him converſant before him. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what anſwer he ſhould make unto God) ſaid firſt that he wondred what was the cauſe his brother was ſo long time abſent: and finally, agrieved in that God continued the queſtion, and did more exactly ſeek after him; he ſaid he was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affairs, Then God reproved and convicted Cain of murthering his brother, and ſpake unto him after this manner, ſaying, that he wondred he ſhould deny the knowledg of his brothers death, whereas he himſelf had ſlain him: notwithſtanding
D he acquitted him of the puniſhment deſerved for this murther, by reaſon that Cain had done ſacrifice, and made requeſt unto God, that it might pleaſe him to remit ſomewhat of the ſeverity of his juſtice againſt him: yet did God curſe him, and threaten to puniſh his ſucceſſours to the ſeventh generation. Then did he drive him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for fear he ſhould be encountred and taken by ſome ſavage beaſts, and that he ſhould periſh after that ſort) God commanded him to ſuſpect no dangerous event fot that cauſe, aſſuring him that he might ſafely travel thorow all regions, without being either aſſaulted or ſeized by ſavage beaſts: and having ſet his mark upon him, by which he might be known; he commanded him to depart the Countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had travelled thorow divers regions, he builded Nais (it was a
E place ſo named) and made his abode therein, and in that place had children. But he received not this chaſtiſement for his better amendment; but rather became worſe and worſe; for he abandoned himſelf to all pleaſures of the body, making it his ſport to outrage thoſe with whom he converſed, filling his houſe with riches gotten by rapine and violence: and inciting other men to follow his pleaſures and thefts. he became their Lord and maſter of all miſchievous exerciſes: he overthrew that ſimplicity which men before that time had uſed in their mutual ſocieties, by the inventions of meaſures and weights; the ignorance thereof was the cauſe that the life of man was eſtranged from deceit: but in ſtead and place of free and ancient courage, he introduced fraud and deceit. He it was that firſt bounded the fields, and builded the firſt city, and made a wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell
F therein. This city was named Enoſa, by the name of Enos his firſt begotten ſonne. But Jared was the ſon of Enos, of Jared iſſued Malehel, whoſe ſonne was Mathuſala, who begot Lamech, who had 77. children by his two wives, Sella and Ada: amongſt whom, Jobel the ſon of Ada was the firſt that made Tents, and took delight to lead a paſtoral life; contenting himſelf with the ſame. Jubal his brother germane exerciſed muſick, and invented the Pſalterie, and the harp. And as touching Thobel one of his ſonnes, by his other wife, he ſurpaſſed all other his brethren in force, and bravely managed the affairs of warre, by which waies he got more ample riches, and means to maintain his life with more pleaſure. He it was that firſt invented the art of forging, and the ſhop alſo: and was father to a daughter named

Chap. IV.

He dio & Ruffinus, chap.6. Gen.5.6. Thoſe whom Joſephus nameth in this place Ange's, Moſes calleth the ſons of unGod. Gen.6.2. Heb.11.7. 2 Pet.2.7, 11,13. IN this manner perſevered they during the courſe of ſeven ages, honouring one God the K Lord of all things, having alwayes a reſpect of virtue. But afterwards in proceſſe of time, they degenerated from the ancient inſtitutions of their fore-fathers, neither obſerving humane lawes, neither continuing their accuſtomed ſervice of God; and they that beforetime induſtriouſly exerciſed themſelves in vertue, afterward with twice as zealous ſtudy followed wickedneſſe; and grew at laſt to that height of impiety, that they provoked Gods heavy diſpleaſure againſt them. For divers Angels of God accompanying themſelves with women, ingendred outragious infants, and contemners of all good, by reaſon of that truſt they had in their forces, whoſe hainous actions were not much unlike thoſe which the Greeks have in their fables feigned of the giants. But Noah perplexed and extreamely diſpleaſed with ſuch their miſdemeanors, exhorted them to change their thoughts, and amend their miſdeeds: and (ſeeing them mollified by no admonitions; but L that they were wholly poſſeſſed with the pleaſure which they took in vices) he fearing leſt they ſhould kill him and his family, left them to their looſeneſſe, and with his wife, children, and all his family, departed into another countrey. Then God (delighting in the juſtice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreme malice, but alſo concluded to deſtroy all whatſoever creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, devoid, and repurged from all impiety: he abridged alſo the life of them, ſo that they lived not any more ſo long time as they were wont, but onely attained the term of ſixſcore years; and he covered the land with waters, and by this means all of them were deſtroyed.
Onely Noah eſcaped by the means and way which God had taught him in ſuch manner as M followeth: He builded an Ark of four ſtages; in length three hundred cubits: in breadth fifty: and in height thirty: into this he entred with his mother, his wife, and his children, and their wives, purveying himſelf of all things requiſite both for their ſuſtenance and uſe: he cloſed alſo therein all ſorts of living creatures, two and two, male and female, for the conſervation of every kind, and of ſome of them ſeven couples. The ſides of this Ark were ſtrong, and the cover alſo; ſo that no water could pierce the ſame, and whatſoever ſtorm might come, it was able to reſiſt it. Thus was Noe (by ſucceſſion of nature, the tenth from Adam) ſaved with all his houſhold; for he was the ſonne of Lamech, whoſe father was Methuſala

A thuſala the ſonne of Enos, the ſonne of Fared, the ſonne of Maleel, who with divers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the ſonne of Seth, the ſonne of Adam. This deſtruction happened, the ſix hundred year of Noahs age (and the ſecond moneth, which was called Dius by the Macedons, and by the Hebrewes Marſomane) for ſo have the Ægyptians diſtinguiſht the year (but Moſes ſet down Niſan for the firſt moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Iſraelites out of the thraldome of the Ægyptians) He made this law therefore, that all things which appertaine to divine ſervice, ſhould take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in reſpect of the times and termes of buying and ſelling, and all other

B traffike, he obſerved the firſt policy of the year, beginning in December: Moſes wrote that the Deluge began the ſeven and twentieth day of the above named moneth, which was the year two thouſand ſix hundred fifty and ſix, after the creation of the firſt man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth and death of great perſonages of that time are moſt exactly ſet down.) At ſuch time then as Adam was 230. years old, his ſon Seth was born unto him, and the ſame Adam lived 930. years; Seth about the age of 250. years, begat Enos, who after he had lived 905. years, left the government of his affaires to his ſonne Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190. year of his age. After that Cainan had lived 910. years, he had his ſonne Maleel, begotten by him the 170. year of his age. The ſaid Maleel having lived 195. years died, leaving his ſon Fared: who about

C the age of 162. years, engendred Enoch, who lived 962. years. After Enoch, ſucceeded his ſon Methuſala, begotten about the age of 162. years, at ſuch time as the ſaid Enochs father was yet alive: and after that Enoch had lived 365. years, he was taken up unto God (whence it cometh to paſſe that his deceaſe hath not been exemplified in writing.) Mathuſala the ſon of Enoch, in the year of his age 187. years, had Lamech for his ſon, who lived 782. years, to whom he left the ſoveraignty, having held the ſame 969. years And Lamech after he had governed 707. years, he declared his ſon Noe for Governour, at ſuch time as the ſaid Lamech had lived 182. years, which Noe governed for the ſpace of 900. years.

All theſe years calculated into one ſum, accompliſh the time above written. Yet to perfect this account, we ought not to ſeek out the deceaſe of theſe Perſonages (for they li-

D ved in the ſame time that their children and ſucceſſours did:) but the onely thing we are to obſerve, is their births. As ſoon then as God had given the ſign, and that it began to rain for the ſpace of whole fourty dayes, the water fell and overflowed the whole earth fourteen cubits high (which was the cauſe that divers could not eſcape, becauſe there was no meanes of flight, or place of refuge.) But as ſoon as the rain was ceaſed, the water began to decreaſe by little and little for the ſpace of one hundred and fifty dayes, about the 27. day of the ſeventh moneth. Noe perceiving then that the Ark was on ground upon the top of a certain mountain of the countrey of Armenia; he opened the ſame, and ſeeing the earth did a little diſcover it ſelf round about the ſame, he conceived ſome better hope, and held himſelf ſatisfied: Some few dayes after, when the water was ebbed ſomewhat more; he

E ſent out a Raven (deſiring to know if the reſt of the earth were delivered from the waters, and whether without danger he might iſſue out of the Ark:) But the Raven finding the earth bebayned in water, returned unto Noe: who the ſeventh day after ſent out a Dove to find out the eſtate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in his nebbe an Olive branch: whereby Noe perceived that the earth was delivered from the Deluge; and having as yet expected ſeven dayes more, he ſet at liberty all living creatures that were in the Ark. But as ſoon as himſelf, his wife, and his family forſooke it, he offered ſacrifice unto God, and feaſted, and rejoyced both he and all his houſhold. The Armenians in their language have called the place where Noe deſcended, by a name Aprobaerion (which ſignifieth as much as deſcent) and in that place even at this preſent the inhabitants of that countrey

F ſhew ſome remnants and memories of the ſame. All thoſe that have written ſtrange Hiſtories, have made mention of this Deluge, and of the Ark: among the number of whom is Beroſus the Chaldean, who now ſetting down occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some ſay likewiſe that a certain part of this Ark is in Armenia, near to the mountain of the Cordæans, and that ſome men have brought from thence ſome part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of that place are wont to uſe inſtead of a preſervative againſt inchantment. Hierome the Egyptian alſo (who hath written the Antiquity of the Phœnicians) hath made mention of this matter: as alſo Mnaſeus with divers others: Nicholas of Damas likewiſe in his ninety ſixt Book ſpeaketh hereof after this manner: Above the Region of Mineans there is a great mountain in Armenia called Baris, in which it is it may be that this is that whereof Moses the Law-maker of the Jewes maketh mention.

But Noe fearing lest God (having condemned all men to a general perdition) should every year overflow the earth after this manner; offered burnt-sacrifice unto God; beseeching him, that hereafter he would entertain the ancient order, and that no so great calamnity might succeed, by which all living creatures should come in danger to be utterly extinct and exterminated; but that inflicting deserved punishment on the reprobate, he would spare the innocent, whom in his mercy he had preserved from danger; otherwise they should be more miserable and condemned by an harder censure, if they were not wholly H warranted, but should be reserved to be swallowed up by another Deluge; and having suffered the fear and sight of the first, to perish by the second. He prayed him therefore that he would be pleased to accept of his sacrifice, and in his mercy vouchsafe that he would hereafter conceive no more any so hainous hate and displeasure against the earth, to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities, might possesse the same in they might equall their forefathers in old years, and length of life.

21. God heareth Noes prayer. Note Hedio and Ruffinus chap. 8. Man is the authour of his death not God. Gods Covenant with Noah.

Noe having in this sort finished his requests, God (who loved him for the uprightnesse of his heart) granted him his request, denying himself to be the author of their deaths who I were drowned, but that they themselves by their own malice had procured those punishments due unto them. For had he desired that they should be extinguished, he would not have brought them into the world. For better it is, not to grant life, then to destroy those to whom thou hast given it. But (saith God) through their contempt of my service and graces, they have inforced me to humble them under the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so exactly pursue and examine their iniquities, to the end to chastise them in my displeasure; especially for thy sake: And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, fear not (how huge and hideous soever the stormes be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water upon the earth. In the mean time I command you to keep your hands innocent from murthers, and all manslaughter, and to punish those that commit wickednesse. I leave K the use of all other living creatures to your sustenance or service; in as much as I have made you Lord over all, as well those that breathe upon the face of the earth, as those that swim in the waters, and such as inhabit and flie amidst the aire: but you shall not eat any blood in as much as therein consisteth the soul and life of living creatures. And I declare unto you, that I will desist to draw the shafts of my displeasure against men. And I will give you the Rainbowe for a sign: for this bowe in their opinion is the bowe of God. And after that God had pronounced these words, and made these promises, he departed.

The Rainbow the sign of atonement between God and Noah, Gen 9. 11, 12. 14, 15. Hedio and Ruffinus chap. 8. Noes age 950. years.

Noe lived after the Deluge three hundred and fifty years, and having spent all this time of his life in happinesse, he dyed after he had lived in the world nine hundred and fifty years.
Neither is there cause why any man (comparing this our present age, and the shortnesse of L years thereof, with the long life of the ancients) should think that false which I have said:
neither followeth it consequently, that because our present life extendeth not to such a terme and continuance of years, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age and long life which we publish of them. For they being beloved of God, and newly created by him, using also a kind of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their years, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their years were of that continuance: Considering that God gave them long life, to the end that they should teach vertue, and should conveniently practise those things which they had invented in Astronomy, and by Geometry: the demonstrations whereof they never had attained, except they had lived at the least six hundred years. For the great year is accomplished by that number of years: M whereof all they bear me witnesse, who either Greeks or Barbarians, have written ancient histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the history of Egypt) and Berosus who hath registred the acts and affaires of the Chaldeans (together with Mochus Hestiæus, Hierome of Egypt) who historified the state of the Phœnicians with others, accord with me in that which I have said. Hesiodus also, Heccataeus, Hellanicus, and Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus do declare, that they of the first world lived one thousand years. Notwithstanding let every man judge of these things, as best liketh him.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

NOe had three ſonnes, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, born one hundreth yeares before the Deluge. Theſe firſt deſcended from the mountaines into the plaines, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceived (who for fear of the Deluge had fled the plaines, and for that cauſe were loath to forſake the mountaines) they gathered courage and perſwaded themſelves to do the like: and the plain where they all dwelt was called Senaar. And whereas they were commanded by God, that (by reaſon of the increaſe and multitude of men) they ſhould ſend certain diſtinct Colonies to inhabit divers countries of the world (to the end that no ſeditions might grow betwixt the one and the other; but contrariwiſe in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great ſtore of fruit) they were ſo ignorant that they diſobeyed God, and falling into great calamities ſuffered the puniſhment of their offences. For, whereas they flouriſhed in increaſe (by reaſon of the great number of their youth) God counſelled them again that they ſhould divide themſelves into colonies. But they (thinking that the goods which they poſſeſſed, proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but preſuming that their force was the onely cauſe of their abundance) did not obey him, but rather ſuſpected that God ſought to betray them, to the end that being thus divided, he might the better ſubdue them: Nemrod incited them in this ſort to mock and contemn God. He was the nephew of Cham the ſonne of Noe: a man valiant and apt for armes: he put them in the head that they ſhould not believe that their good hap proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their own vertue, which furniſhed them with ſo much riches: ſo that in a little ſpace he reduced the eſtate to a tyranny; ſuppoſing by this onely means that he might make men revolt againſt God, if he might perſwade them to ſubmit themſelves to his government; giving them to uuderſtand, that if God ſhould once more ſend a Deluge, he would take revenge on him in mens behalf, and that he would build a tower, to whoſe top the water ſhould not attempt, and revenge the death of his predeceſſours. The common ſort was ready to follow theſe ordinances of Nemrod, ſuppoſing it to be puſillanimity in themſelves, if they ſhould obey God. For which cauſe they began to build the tower with their uttermoſt induſtry, neither was there any one idle in all that work: yea, ſo great a number of labourers were there, that the work was raiſed to a height beyond all expectation. The thickneſſe whereof was ſo great, that it obſcured the height thereof: and it was built of burnt brick, and cemented and joyned with a bituminous morter, to the end that it ſhould not receive any cleft in the ſame.

But God ſeeing their madneſſe, condemned them not to a general extermination (by reaſon that they had made no profit by their example, who periſhed in the firſt Deluge) but made them mutine the one againſt the other by changing of their tongue; ſo that by reaſon of their diverſities of language, they could not one underſtand one another. The place where this tower was builded, is at this preſent called Babylon (by reaſon of the confuſion of tongues that firſt began in that place) for Babel in Hebrew ſignifieth confuſion. Of this tower and the diverſity of languages Sibylla hath made mention in theſe words: At ſuch time as men uſed one kind of language, they builded a moſt high tower, as if they meant by the ſame to mount up into heaven: but the gods ſent down winds and overthrew the tower, and gave every one his diſtinct and ſeveral language, whence ſprung the cauſe that their City was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Senaar in Babylon, Heſtiæus teſtifieth after this manner, It is ſaid of thoſe Sacrificers, that being eſcaped, they took the ſacred reliques of Jupiter Enyelius, and came into Senaar in Babylon.

even unto Tana; and Europa, unto Gades, occupying the Countrey which they first met with, and was not beforetime by man inhabited, each one calling his several Nation by his own name: for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians. Magog dwelt amongst those, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greeks Scythes. Of Madus (the first begotten son of Japhet) issued the Madians, whom the Greeks have named Medes: and of Javan his other son, the Ionians, and Greeks took their original: Thobelus gave name likewise to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meschus was the author of them that were called Meschates, who are lately named Cappadocians: for they shew even at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City of Masaca, which I testifieth to those that conceive the same, that this Nation hath been so called. Theres named them Therians, who were under his Government, whom the Greeks called Thracians: and thus many Nations took their original from the sons of Japhet: but of the three sons which Gomar had, Aschanaxes gave original to the Aschanaxians (at this day termed Rhegians by the Greeks) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhiphatæans, called, at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. As touching Javan the son of Japet, he had three sons, of whom Abisus gave name to the Abisians, who at this day present are the Aetoleans, over whom he commanded: Tharsus ingendred the Tharsians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane City Tharsis; whose first letter is O instead of K
Th. Chetimus obtained the Isle of Cherine, called at this day Cypris, (whence it happeneth, that not onely all the Islands, but also divers other places on the Sea-coast are by the Hebrewes called by this word Cethim) witnesse one of the Cities of Cypris, which hath had the reputation to conserve her ancient name. For it is called Citium, by those that wrest the same to the Greek sense, a word not very much varying from Cethim. These Nations were occupied by the sons and young children of Japhet. But I will first publish that which perhaps is unknown to the Greeks, and then prosecute my purposed narration which I have omitted, that is, that these names are formed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end they should be more sweet and pleasant to them that should over-read them. For this termination is not proper to our Nation, which hath but one form, and no variation of termination: for L whereas the Greeks pronounce Ἀδάμ, we say Adam: and where they say, Noches, the Hebrews say Noe, and keep this termination in all things.

Whose names are partly wholly abolished, and partly changed, and applied to others; so as they are very hard to be understood: for of the four sons of Cham, the name of Chus hath not been changed by time: for the Egyptians, (over whom they extend their Dominion) have been named Chuseans, by them, and by all, the Asians: the name of Misraim hath continued also in the memory of men: for we that bound upon Egypt, call that Countrey the Countrey of Misraim, and the Æthiopians Misramites. Phut M likewise firmed the Colonies of Libya, and called the Inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; and there is a River in the Countrey of Mauritania, which hath the same name, of which it is most manifest that divers Greek Histories make mention, as also of the Countrey near adjoyning, which they call the countrey of Phut, but it hath changed his present name by the meanes of one Licis one of the sons of Misraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter signifie unto you) As touching Canaan the fourth son of Cham, he dwelled in the Countrey at this day called Judæa, and called it the Countrey of Canaan according to his name. How Abraham the Author of our Nation departed from the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in a certain Countrey of the Chanaanites, which is now called Judea.

Gen. 12. 1. ad 4.

The year of the world, 2024. before Christs Nativity, 1940.

Abraham having no issue, adopted Lot the son of Aram his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: he departed out of the countrey of Chaldeis, when he was 75. years old (having had commandement from God to depart thence into Canaan) in which countrey he remained, and left the same to his posterity after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of understanding, and apt to perswade those that gave ear unto him, without any default in his foresight and providence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first undertook to convince the received and erroneous opinions of men, as touching the Deity. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, and prove, that there was but one God, Governour and Maker of all things; and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicitie, it happened unto us not by our own workings, but his holy will. And this observed and approved he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea, as also those things which he saw daily occure by the influences of the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres: namely, that there was a certain power that disposed them, and decently administred all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable unto us; whereas not'aing of himself hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiving should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and counsels of his (seeing the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that countrey, and follow the will and favour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an Altar, and sacrificed unto God. Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our father Abraham, although he named him not, when he speaketh after this manner: after the Deluge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most just, excellent, and upright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestial bodies. But Hecatæus made more then a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath written of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, hear what he saith of the fourth Book of his Histories: Abraham reigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arrived with his Army from a countrey scituate above Babylon called Chaldæa, who a little while after (departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a countrey at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Judæa, and his posterity multiplyed therein. In another Treatise I will recite that which is reported of him: The name of Abraham even at this day, is honourable in the countrey of Damasco, and there is a village to be seen which beareth his name, and is called Abrahams house.

Gen. 12. 13.

After this (when famine had invaded the land of Chanaan) Abraham had intelligence that the Ægyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himself to retire himself towards them: as well to conferre with their Priests (and discourse with them of Divine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in understanding, or reconcile them, if his judgement were more assured then theirs. He led with him his wife Sara:

A Sara: and understanding that the Egyptians were much addicted unto women (to the end the King should not put him to death, of purpose that he might enjoy his Wife Sara, who was very beautiful) he devised this excuse, to say, that she was his sister; charging her, that if the matter came in question, she should not fail, but confirm the like. But no sooner came he into Egypt, but the like fortune encountred them, as Abraham had beforetime suspected: for the beautie of his wife was suddenly published in every place. For which cause, Pharaoh the King of that Nation (desirous to see that with his eyes, the which he had heard with his ears) he sought for, sent and lusted after her: but God withstood this his unbridled lust, by afflicting the Kings subjects with a Plague, and his affairs by sedition. Whereupon taking counsel of the Priests, what remedy might be used, and means might be sought to appease
B the Divine Majestie, they answered him, That this was the cause of their afflictions, for that he thought to have done violence to the strangers Wife: Whereat being much affrighted, the King first questioneth with the woman, what she was, and who her companion should be: and at last resolved of the truth, he satisfied Abraham, saying, he supposed her to be his sister, not his Wife; and that his purpose was not to offer injurie, but seek alliance: so giving him a great summe of money, he gave him leave to conferre with the most excellentest and learnedst Priests among the Egyptians. Whence it came to passe, that he grew into great estimation, in regard of his vertues: for whereas that Nation was divided into differ-
C rent Sects and Opinions, and through mutuall contempt and division were incensed the one against the other; he declared, that their opinions (different, and confuted by themselves) in respect of Religion, were most vain, and devoid of all truth. For these his disputations he was held in great regard among them, and esteemed for a most wise, and a personage most excellent; not onely in well-conceiving; but also in expressing and perswading that which he undertook to teach. To these most graciously imparted he that Science of Arithmetick, and the observation of the celestial Bodies: for before that Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of those Sciences. But he transported them from Chaldea into Egypt, and from thence are they derived to the Greeks. As soon as he returned into Chanaan, he divided the Countrey with Lot: and for that their grew a contention be-D twixt their shepheards as touching the bounding of those Pastures where they fed their cattel) he gave Lot the choice and election of that Countrey which best pleased him, retaining unto himself that which was left. Thus pitching his Tents neer the mountain in a Citie called Hebron (which was by seven yeers more ancient then Tanis in Egypt) he dwelled there. But Lot chose the Plaine neer to the flood of Jordan, not far from Sodome; which in those dayes was a goodly Citie: but at this present, by the divine justice and wrath of God, is utterly defaced; so that no memory remaineth thereof. The overthrow of the Sodomites by the Syrians.

E AT that time when the Assyrians were Lords over all Asia, the estate of Sodom flourished in all affluence, encreased in great riches, and multitude of gallant youths, and the Countrey was governed by five Kings; these were, Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus, and Balin, (each one particularly seized of his Province and Kingdome.) Against these, the Assyrians encamped themselves; and having divided their Armie into foure parts (under the conduct of foure Governours) they waged battell with them; in which the Assyrians attaining the day, they imposed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom: who (after they had for twelve yeers space performed their dutie, and payed their Tribute) in the thirteenth yeer revolted from them. Whereby it came to pass, that the Assyrians levied a new Armie against them, under the conduct and command of Marphad,
F Arioch, Chodollogomar, and Thargal, who sacked all Syria, and extinguished the posteritie of the Gyants. And drawing neer to Sodom, they encamped neer to the bituminous Pits (for at that time there were Pits in that place:) but as soon as Sodom was destroyed, there arose a Lake in that place, which (by reason of the bituminous matter that flowed in the same) was called Asphaltes, that is to say, bituminous. Of this Lake hereafter we will speak somewhat. But the Sodomites encountering with the Assyrians, there was a dangerous skirmish fought, wherein many perished on both sides, and the rest were either slain or taken; amongst whom, was Lot led away captive, who came thither to assist the Sodomites.

The year of the world, 2037. before Chriſts nativity, 1933.

Hedio & Ruffinu, chap. 8. Gen. 14. 14, 15, 16.

Abraham hearing of theſe things, and moved (both with the ſurpriſal of his couſin Lot, as alſo with the ſlaughter of his friends and neighbours) preſently addreſſed himſelf with all his followers, to give them ſuccours: and ſuch diligence ſhewed he in purſuit of them, that the fifth night after he encountred the Aſſyrians neer to Dan, which is one of the ſources of Jordan.

Where ſurpriſing them on the ſudden (unſuſpitious and diſarmed) he killed thoſe that were aſleep, without ſuſpition of his coming; and they that were not yet aſleep, and lay wallowing in their drunkenneſs, he eaſily defeated and put to flight; purſuing them in ſuch ſort, that the ſecond day after he drave them all into Soba, a Citie of Damaſco. Declaring hereby, that victory conſiſteth not in the multitude of thoſe that manage their Armes, but rather in the courage of thoſe that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth alwayes then a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him above three hundred and eighteen of his houſhold ſervants, and three of his friends to defeat this huge Army. So that whatſoever they were that eſcaped out of this ſlaughter by flight, returned unto their houſes with ignominie.

On what, Victory dependeth.

As ſoon as Abraham had reſcued thoſe priſoners of Sodom which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot, he returned into his Countrey, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in place called the Kings field) where alſo he was entertained by the King of Solyma, called Melchiſedech (which is as much to ſay as the juſt King:) for in truth he was no leſſe; but was held worthie, by reaſon of his juſtice, in all mens opinion, to ſacrifice as the high Prieſt of Almighty God. This Solyma in proceſſe of time was called Jeruſalem. This Melchiſedech did friendly entertain all the followers of Abraham, not ſuffering them to want any thing that was fit for their ſuſtenance; but entertaining him alſo at his own Table, he highly praiſed him, and ſung due Hymnes of praiſe to the great God, for that by his favour he had vouchſafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other ſide preſented him with the tenths of his ſpoiles: but the King of Sodom remitted all the prey that was taken, and onely required to be poſſeſſed of thoſe Captives which were of the Countrey: which condition he accepted not, anſwering, That he would receive no profit of that prey, but that which he muſt needily have for the entertainment of his ſervants. Yet gave he a portion unto his friends who had ſuccoured him; the firſt whereof was called Eſchal; and the two other, Ennerus and Mambres. For this cauſe God praiſed Abraham, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not want the reward that is due unto thee for thy valiant acts. To which he replied, And what good ſhall I reap of this recompence, If I have not an heir to poſſeſſe it after my deceaſe? for as yet he had no iſſue. Then did God promiſe him a ſonne, whoſe poſterity ſhould be ſo multiplied, that they might in number equal the Stars of Heaven: which when he underſtood, he offered ſacrifice unto God, following that Commandement which he had received: He took therefore a Heifer of three years old, a Goat of three yeers, and a Ramme of three yeers, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon; all which he divided in twain, as he was commanded, the birds onely excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at ſuch time as the Fowles hovered about, to have part of the bloud of thoſe beaſts which were ſacrificed) He received an Oracle that told him, That his progeny ſhould have evil neighbours in Egypt for the ſpace of four hundred yeers; and that after they had ſuffered an inſupportable ſervitude, they ſhould at laſt obtain the victory over their enemies: and after that they had by ſtrong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they ſhould be Lords and poſſeſſours of their Countreyes and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt neer to the Oake that was called Ogis, in the Countrey of Canaan, neer to the Citie of Hebron. There being much grieved that his wife conceived not, he beſought God to give him an iſſue Male: God commanded him to be of good cheer in all things, and that being come from Meſopotamia upon good occaſions, he alſo ſhould have children. At that time Sara, by the commandment of God, cauſed one of her handmaids, which was an Egyptian born, to enter in unto her husband, to the end he might have iſſue by her: now Agar, as ſoon as ſhe perceived that ſhe had conceived, began to contemne Sara, aſpiring to principalitie, and ſuppoſing that her iſſue ſhould ſucceed in the kingdom. For which cauſe, Abraham delivered her unto his Wife, to the end ſhe ſhould puniſh her: which ſhe perceiving, ſhe decreed to flie, in that ſhe was afraid of puniſhment, beſeeching God to have mercy on her: and as ſhe travelled on her way thorow the deſart, the Angell of God appeared unto her, commanding her, that ſhe ſhould return

To this Commandement of God Agar ſubmitted her ſelf with all obedience, and returning back again to her Maſter and Miſtris, ſhe obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Iſmael, which is as much to ſay as, Heard of God, becauſe God had heard the mothers prayers. Iſmael was born to Abraham when he was fourſcore and ſix years old: but in the fourſcore and nineteenth year of his age God appeared unto him, and told him that he ſhould have a ſonne by Sara, charging him to call him Iſaac, giving him to underſtand, that great Nations, and Kings ſhould iſſue from his loines, who by force of armes ſhould conquer all the countrey of Chanaan, from Sidon even unto Egypt. Commanding him, that his poſterity ſhould be circumciſed in their privities, and that this circumciſion ſhould be done the eighth day after their birth, by reaſon that he would not that Abrahams poſterity ſhould be intermedled with other Nations. But hereafter wil I declare the cauſe of our circumciſion. Abraham alſo asked counſel of God as touching Iſmael, whether he ſhould live or no; who told him that he ſhould flouriſh many years, and that he ſhould become a father of many worthy Nations. Then gave Abraham thanks unto God, and
C preſently circumciſed himſelf, his ſon Iſmael with all his family; and Iſmael at that time was thirteen years old, but Abraham about fourſcore and nineteen years of age.

CHAP. XII.

Gen. 18.

ABout that time the inhabitants of Sodom became immeaſurably proud, by reaſon of their affluence, proſperity, and great riches; and committed outrages againſt men, and impieties againſt God: in ſuch manner as they had forgotten the benefits which they had received at his hands, hating ſtrangers, and diſdaining to converſe the one with the other, but in diſordinate and abominable inceſts. Whereat God be-D ing diſpleaſed, he decreed to puniſh their intolerable pride, to ruinate their Citie from the top to the bottome, and in ſuch ſort to make deſolate their Countrey, that from thence-forward it ſhould neither nouriſh, plant, nor bring forth fruit. After that God had pronounced this ſentence againſt the Sodomites; Abraham (as he ſate under the Oak at Mambres before the door of his tent) beheld three Angels, and ſuppoſing them to be men and ſtrangers, he aroſe and ſaluted them; and approaching near unto them, he deſired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him.
E Whereunto when they had condeſcended, he commanded his ſervants to bake them bread of the fineſt flower, and having killed and roſted a calf, he ſet it before them (as they ſat under the Oake) ſuppoſing they would eate: but they enqnired of him where Sara his wife was: to whom he anſwered that ſhe was within in the tent. They told him then that they would return again; and that they ſhould finde her a Mother. But when his wife ſmiled thereat, and ſaid that it was impoſſible for her to bear children; eſpecially in that her ſelf was at that time nintie years old, and her husband an hundreth, they diſcovered themſelves, and ſaid they were Angels of God, and that they were ſent one of them to aſſure him that he ſhould have a ſonne; the other two to deſtroy the Sodomites. Which F when Abraham heard, he was ſorry for the Sodomites, and ariſing beſought God that he would not deſtroy both the juſt and the unjuſt together. To whow God gave this anſwer, that there was not one juſt man among the Sodomites, and that if he might but finde tenne, he would ſpare the city from puniſhment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entred into Sodom: where no ſooner were they arrived, but Lot invited them to take their lodging in his houſe (for he was a man much given to hoſpitalitie, and ſuch a one as for bounty had beene Abrahams ſcholar.) But the Sodomites perceiving that thoſe young men which were entred Lots houſe, were of excellent beauty; began to offer outrage and villany to their perſons: notwithſtanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themſelves, and not to offer villany to his gueſts, but in ſome ſort to have a reſpect to his houſe; telling them: that rather they ſhould continue in that intemperance, he would give them his daughters to uſe at their pleaſure. But he prevailed nothing with them; whereupon God was in ſuch wiſe provoked by their iniquitie, that he blinded their eyes in ſuch ſort, as they could not find the gate to enter into Lots houſe, and condemned the Sodomites to a general perdition. But Lot foremoniſhed by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and took with him his wife, and his two daughters as yet unmarried (for their betrothed huſbands, although they were forewarned by him, contemned and held him for a dotard.) Then did God ſhoot his arrow upon the City, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and deſolating by the ſame fire all the countries round about; in ſuch ſort as it hath already bin declared by me in the Hiſtory I wrote of the warres of the Jewes. But Lots wife, as they retired thence, looking back towards the City and more curiouſly beholding the deſtruction thereof, contrary to the Commandement of God, was transformed into a pillar of ſalt, which I have ſeen: for it remaineth even untill this day. As touching Lot, he and his daughters fled and dwelt in a little countrey farre from the fire, which was called Zoar (which in Hebrew ſignifieth little:) In this place (which was void of men, and ſcant of victuals) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a ſolitary and poore life; and his daughters ſuppoſing that all mankind was extinguiſhed upon the earth, ſubtilly circumventing their father, they lay with him when he leaſt ſuſpected it: and the reaſon that drew them thereunto was, for that they feared leſt mankind ſhould be utterlly exterminated. By this their approachment, they bare him two ſonnes: the elder Moab (which is as much to ſay as of my father) and this is he that was the father of the Moabites, which even at this day are yet a great Nation: and of the younger ſiſter, came Ammon (which ſignifieth the ſonne of Race or kind) and both theſe two Nations inhabite the countrey of Cæloſyria. In this ſort departed Lot from the Sodomites.

As touching Abraham, he went and dwelt in Gerar, in the countrey of Paleſtine; leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his ſiſter; (uſing the ſame ſubtilty which beforetime he had practiſed for fear of the Egyptians:) for he feared Abimelech the King of that countrey, who ſurpriſed with the love of Sara would have raviſhed her, had he not bin hindred by a moſt grievous ſickneſſe, which God inflicted upon him: ſo that being out of all hope of recovery, at ſuch time as he ſlept, there appeared unto him a viſion, which told him that he ſhould take heed leſt he offered any outrage to the ſtrangers wife, who was come into his conntrey: and after he was ſomewhat recovered, he told his friends how God had ſent him that ſickneſſe to warrantize the right of the ſtranger, and to preſerve his wife from violence, for that ſhe was not his ſiſter, but his lawfull wife; willing Abraham thence forward to be of good cheer, promiſing him, that the honour of his wife was inviolate. This ſaid; he diſmiſſed Abraham by the counſel of his friends; and told him that he needed not to ſuſpect his wife, by reaſon ſhe had ſuffered no villany: Aſſuring him that God had care of her, and that he delivered her in ſafety to him (being to that end protected by his mighty power) and in confirmation thereof he called God to record, and the womans conſcience, vowing that he would not have required her, if he had known ſhe had been married: moreover, he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appeaſe Gods wrath, which was kindled againſt him. And that if thence forward he would ſtay with them, he ſhould want nothing: or if he liſted to depart, he promiſed him guides and all other things, for which he came unto him: Abraham anſwered him, that he had in no ſort diſſembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife; but that ſhe was his brothers daughter, and that he thought he might not ſafely travel thorow his countrey, except he had uſed that ſubtilty; avowing moreover that he had not been the cauſe of that ſickneſſe which had befalne him; but that he ſingularly affected his good, and was ready to abide with him.

Whereupon Abimelech imparred unto him both lands and money, and accorded to converſe with him in all uprightneſſe, and without offer of offence, and made a Covenant and ſware unto him by a certain pit which was called Berſabe (that is to ſay, the pit of ſwearing or Covenant) which name that place retaineth untill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a ſonne by Sara his wife according as God had promiſed him, and he called his name Iſaac (which in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth laughter) becauſe Sara laughed at ſuch time as God had ſaid unto her ſhe ſhould bear a ſonne, having in her ſelf no likelihood of conceiving, by reaſon ſhe was ſtriken in years. For at that time ſhe was ninty years old, and Abraham one hundred when the child was born, and incontinently the eighth day after was he circumciſed; which cuſtome is yet continued amongſt the Jewes, who circumciſe on the eighth day.

Abraham baniſheth Iſmael and Agar.

The Angel of God meeteth with Agar.

BUt the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth year. For Iſmael the author thereof, and Abrahams ſonne by the concubine, was circumciſed in the thirteenth year after he was born. Of which Iſmael it behoveth we ſpeak more exactly in this place. Sara loved Iſmael (begotten on her ſervant Agar) from the beginning, with no leſſe affection then as if he had been her own ſonne, for he was brought up as Abrahams heir. But after ſhe had brought forth Iſaac, ſhe thought it no more requiſite that Iſmael ſhould be brought
B up with her ſonne, in that he was elder, and for fear leſt after his fathers deceaſe, he ſhould offer his younger brother injury. She incited Abraham therefore to ſend both him and his mother to ſome other place: but at the firſt he gave no eare to Sara's requeſt, thinking it to be more then barbarous cruelty, to drive away a tender child and his mother, deſtitute of all neceſſaries. At length by the Commandement of God he liſtened to his wifes counſell, and committed the child unto his mother (being of himſelf as yet unapt to travel) and giving them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to go thither, whither their neceſſity ſhould drive them. And when their victuals failed them, and their water was conſumed, ſhe laid the child being faint and weak under an Oak, and to the end that in her preſence he ſhould not breath his laſt, ſhe went far
C away from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared unto her, ſhewing her a fountain hard by that place, and charging her to look to the carefull education of her child: becauſe that by the conſervation of Iſmael, ſhe was to expect great happineſſe. Upon theſe promiſes ſhe took comfort, and falling into the company of ſhepherds, ſhe by their bounty eſcaped from miſery.

Gen. 22. 1, 2.

The year of the world, 2074. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 1890.

AS touching Iſaac, Abraham loved him with an intire and fatherly affection; as his onely begotten ſonne engendered in his age by the bounty of God. The child alſo addicting himſelf unto all vertue, carefull to honour his father and mother, and ſtudious of the ſervice of God, invited both his parents the rather to affect and love him. So that Abraham was very deſirous to forſake this preſent life: provided, that he might E leave behind him all the goods which he had unto his ſonne; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (under trial and conformity of his faith) God appeared unto him, and reckoned up all the benefits which he had beſtowed on him, how he had granted him victory over his enemies (and how he had eſtabliſht and bleſt him with preſent felicity by his favour) for which cauſe he required him to ſacrifice, and make an oblation unto him of his ſonne Iſaac, commanding him that he ſhould conduct him to the mountain of Morea, and there to ſacrifice him. In doing whereof, he ſhould manifeſt the deſire he had to ſerve him (in preferring that which was agreeable to God before the life of his ſonne.) Abraham ſuppoſing that it was no wayes lawful to diſobey God, but that he ought to ſub-
F mit himſelf to his will, (as to him by whoſe providence all things had their being) ſaid nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his ſonne.

Moreover, he made it known to no one of his houſhold-ſervants, becauſe (as he ſuppoſed) they might have hindered him from the ſervice of God. He therefore took his ſonne Iſaac with two ſervants (loading an Aſſe with ſuch things as were requiſite for ſacrifice) and travelled towards the mountain, his ſervants attending him for two dayes ſpace; and on the third day following, as ſoon he perceived the mountain, he left the reſt of thoſe that accompanied him in the plain, and attended onely by his ſonne and himſelf:

he came up unto the mountain upon which afterwards King David appointed that the Temple should be builded.) They carried with them also the rest of those things which were requisite for sacrifice (save onely the beast that was to be offered:) now about this time, Isaac was five and twenty years old, and did himself prepare the Altar, and enquired of his father what he should offer, considering that as yet they had no sheep for sacrifice. Abraham answered him, that God would furnish them, who was of power sufficient to give men that in abundance, whereof they had need, and to deprive them of that they had, and whereof they held themselves throughly possessed: and that it was he would give them wherewith to sacrifice, (if it should please him to shew himself favourable, and propitious to that sacrifice of his:) now as soon as the Altar was made ready, and the wood prepared and laid upon the same, and all things were in readinesse, he addressed his speech unto his son, and said thus: G H

9. Abrahams oration at such time as his sonne should have been sacrificed.

My sonne, I have oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that he should give thee life, by my in*finite* intercessions and prayers, and ever since thou wert born into this world, I have intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither have I thought that in any thing I might be made more happy, then that departing out of this world, I might see thee at mans estate, and leave thee the heir and Lord of all my substance: but since it hath pleased God, that I should be thy father, and that the same God likewise now thinketh good that I should forsake thee, put upon thee a constant minde, and take in good part that thus thou must be sacrificed: "For in so doing I fulfil the Commandements of God: who "requireth at our hands that we do him this honour, for the favours which he hath be- "stowed upon me, in assisting me, and in familiar manner conversing, and associating me "both in war and peace. Since therefore that being born, thou art to die, (not after the "accustomed manner of the living) but being offered in sacrifice by thine own father, to "the general Father, God; I deeme it reasonable, that since it seemeth good unto him "that thou depart out of this life (not by sickness, nor by war, nor by any other incon- "venience, that naturally hapneth unto men) that it is behoveful also that thou render "thy soul unto him in the midst of prayers, and the celebration of this sacrifice, to the "end he may receive and seat thee near himself: Thou shalt be my purveyor, and stay of "mine age (which is the cause for which I have nourished thee) if thou leave me God for "my purveyor and comfort in thy place. Then Isaac with a noble heart (like the gracious "sonne of so godly a father) heard all that which his father said with great contentment, "and assured that he would rather never have been born, then he should once neglect the "Ordinance of God, and of his Father: or shew himself negligent to submit his will to "both their pleasures, considering that if his Father onely should command the same, he "should do very evil if he disobeyed him: which said, he marched towards the Altar, and "offered himself to the slaughter: which had surely hapned at that instant, if God had not regarded him: for with a loud voyce he called Abraham by his name, commanding him that he should not kill his sonne, averring that he had not given him that commandement, because he took pleasure in humane blood, neither for that by such impiety he would deprive him of that sonne, of whom it was his pleasure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to prove his affection, to see whether being commanded such a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made trial of his faith and readinesse, and his un- speakable piety, he did not repent him of that good he had done unto him: that the time should never be wherein he would forget to have care of him, and his race, whensoever he should pray unto him, and that when the course of his years were happily overpast, he should leave a great signory to those of his children, which should be good and legitimate. He told him moreover, that he wonld multiply the race in divers Nations, and that he would bestow great benefits upon them, and that the memorie of the chief of his off- spring should be envied of all men for their greatnesse. After that God had spoken after this manner, it pleased him on the sudden (no man knoweth how) to cause a Ramme to be seen and found thereabouts for the sacrifice. And thus (being delivered from all evils and inconveniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard so many promises of so ma- ny blessings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the sacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in safety, and past the remnant of their lives in happinesse, God gi- ving them his blessing in whatsoever they undertook. AFter this Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had ſix children, ſtrong in travell, and excellent in wiſdome: namely Zembranes, Jazar, Madar, Madian, Louſobac, Suus, who likewiſe had ſonnes; Suus had Sabacan, and Dadanes. Of all theſe children and their ſucceſſours, Abraham gathered and eſtabliſhed the colonies which poſſeſſed the countrey of the Troglodytes, and all the countrey of Arabia the happy, whoſe confines extend even unto the Red-ſea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libya, and poſſeſſed the ſame; and that his ſucceſſours (making their abode in that countrey) called it by the name of Africa. And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhiſtor who writeth after this manner. Cleodemus the Prophet who is alſo called Malchus, and hath written the acts of the Jewes (according as Moſes their lawmaker hath compiled the ſame in writing) ſaith, that of Chetura there were divers children born unto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit, Apher, Surim and Faphet, and that of Surem the Aſſyrians took their name: of the two others, Apher, and Faphet, the City of Affrick, and the countrey of Africa take their names. And as touching the place where the viſion appeared unto him, he hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greek tongue ſignifieth the houſe of God. Continuing thus his journey into Meſopotamia, he travelled ſo long, till at laſt he arrived at Charran: and having met in the ſuburbs of the Citie with certain ſhepherds and young men, accompanied with young maidens, ſitting neer to a certain fountain, he drew neer unto them, deſiring them to give him drink; and falling in diſcourſe with them, he asked them, Whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet alive? All of them anſwered, that they knew him
B well; and that he was a man of that reputation, that his name could not be concealed; that his daughter was accuſtomed to feed her flock with them, and that they wondered that ſhe was not yet arrived; of whom (ſaid they) thou mayeſt perfectly underſtand all that which thou deſireſt to know. Whileſt thus they paſt the time in talk, the damoſel drew neer, accompanied with her ſhepherds; whom one of the company informed, that Jacob was inquiſitive after her father: who rejoycing after the manner of young maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what neceſſity had driven him thither? wiſhing ſhe had the means to ſupply whatſoever his neceſſities required. Jacob being overcome, not by the force of affinity, or by her good behaviour and courteſie, but with the love of the maiden, was inflamed, ſeeing her ſo fair and matchleſs in beautie, and ſaid unto her: If thou art the C daughter of Laban, there is a greater and more ancient conjunction betwixt both thy father, thy ſelf and me, then either thy yeers or my birth can attain unto: for, Abraham, Aran, and Nachor, were Tharas ſons; Bathuel, thy grand father, was Nachors ſon; Iſaac, my father, was the ſon of Abraham; and Sara, daughter of Aran. There is yet a neerer and dearer bond of friendſhip, wherewith we are linked one unto another: for Rebecca, my mother, is ſiſter unto Laban thy father, born of one father and mother; ſo that you and I are couſins: and therefore now am I come at this preſent to ſalute you, and renew that ancient love which our alliance requireth at our hands. But ſhe remembring her of all thoſe things which her father was wont to report and diſcourſe of Rebecca, and knowing, that her Parents were deſirous to heare ſome news from her, ſhe wept for joy, remembring her of the love of her father, and hung about his neck, and embraced the young man; and after ſhe had ſaluted him, ſhe ſaid unto him:
D Thou bringeſt a moſt deſired and great pleaſure to my father and all his family, who never forgetteth thy mother, but oftentimes maketh mention of her; and would eſteem it a great felicitie to hear tidings from her. Then deſired ſhe him preſently to follow her to her father, leſt any longer he might be deprived of ſo deſired a pleaſure. This ſaid, ſhe brought him unto Laban; where, being acknowledged by his uncle, he both by that means lived ſecurely amongſt his friends, as alſo brought him great contentment, by his unexpected acceſſe unto them. Some few dayes after, this Laban told him, that he took ſo much contentment in his preſence, that he could not expreſſe it in words; yet required he him to manifeſt the cauſe that had induced him to leave his father and mother in that extreme age, at ſuch time as they had moſt need of him, to find him out: moreover, he promiſed him all
E affiſtance and favour in whatſoever caſe he had to make uſe of him. Whereupon Jacob diſcourſed unto him the whole matter: that Iſaac had two ſonnes; himſelf, and Eſau: that his brother (in that, by his mothers device and counſell, he had defrauded him of his fathers bleſſing) ſought and deſired to kill him, as he that was the raviſher of that principalitie from him that was deſtinated unto him by God, and the ſurpriſer of all his fathers other intended vows, that this, as alſo his mothers command, was the cauſe why he came thither; by reaſon they are all brothers, and by reaſon that in eſpecial his mother was their neereſt akin: telling him, that next after God, he hoped to finde his greateſt affiſtance and help by the means of his uncle. Whereupon Laban promiſing unto him whatſoever humanitie he could imagine (as well in reſpect of their common anceſtors, as for the love he bare unto his mother; towards whom, although ſhe were abſent, he would expreſſe his good affection, in F ſhewing himſelf well affected towards him that was there preſent:) he told him then, that he would give him the charge of his flock, and make him maſter over all his ſhepherds; and that when he ſhould think good to return back again to his friends, he ſhould depart with ſuch rewards and honours as might well beſeem a friend ſo neerly allyed unto him as he was. Which when Jacob underſtood, he anſwered, That he would willingly endure any ſort of labour in Labans ſervice, and that his devoir towards him would be a delight to himſelf: but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to wife; who deſerved to be honoured by him with no leſſe title, for many cauſes; but in eſpeciall, for that ſhe had brought him thither:

ther: avowing, that the love which he bare unto her, was the cause why he used those speeches. Laban (being highly delighted and contented with this his discourse) granted him his consent in the marriage, telling him, that he could not have wisht for a better sonne in law: and that if he would sojourne a while with him, he would make him Lord of all that his heart desired, especially for that he was no wayes minded to send his daughter among the Canaanites; and that it repented him, that (by reason of marriage) his sister had been drawn thither. Iacob condescended upon these conditions, and covenanted to abide with him for the space of seven yeers (for he determined to serve his father in law during that terme of yeers, to the end, that having made proof of his vertue, it might the better appear what he was.) Now the time which was covenanted between them being expired, and Iacob expecting the contented possession of his love which was promised him, Laban prepared a nuptiall feast: and when the neight drew on, and Iacob least suspected, he bringeth his daughter, lesse fair in face, and more elder in yeers, and layeth her by him; who deceived with the darknesse, and for that he had drunk liberally, lay with her: but the day after discovering the deceit, he questioned with Laban, and accused him; who asked him pardon, alledging the necessitie which inforced him to do that which he did. For, he had not brought in Lea under intent to deceive him, but that the custome of the country compelled him thereunto: yet that the same should no waies hinder him, but that he should enjoy Rachel, and receive, see, and have use of her, after seven yeers more were fully expired. Herewith Iacob grew pacified, and suffered himself to be perswaded (in that the love which he bare unto Rachel, suffered him to do no otherwayes) and when the other seven yeers were expired, he married Rachel. Now, both of these had two chamber-maids, which their father had given them: Leas maid was called Zelpha, and Rachels, Bala; who were no slaves, but onely subjects. Lea was touched with great grief, in that Iacob bare greater affection to her sister then to herself, bethinking her oftentimes, that if she might have children, she should be better esteemed and beloved by her husband: for which cause she continually besought Almightie God, that it might please him to give her issue: whereupon it happened that God gave her a sonne, and Iacobs affection was turned towards her; for which cause she called him Ruben, that is to say, the sonne of Vision, because she had obtained him through the mercie of God.

Ruben, the eldest of all the sonnes of Lea, brought his mother apples of Mandragora; which when Rachel had perceived, she desired her to give her a part thereof, in that she longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yeeld no consent, replying, That she ought to content her self in that she had the prerogative in love, in respect of both their beloved, which was Iacob. Rachel mollifying the heart of her sister with kinde words, said unto her, That she would be content that Iacob should lye with her for that night; which Iacob performed for the love of Rachel: and Lea once more had children, namely, Issachar, (which signifieth, Come by hire) and Zabulon, which importeth a pledge of good will; besides whom, she had a daughter also, called Dina. To this intent he made trial of his wives, to see how they were affected towards his flight; who heartned him by their consents: insomuch as Rachel having surprised the images of those gods which were honoured in that countrey, fled away with her sister; who both of them led with them all their children on both sides, their handmaids, with the rest of all their substance. Iacob also drove away the moity of the Cattel, without the witting or will of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the images of the gods, although she had been taught by Iacob to con-

A temne them, and yield them no honour: but ſhe ſuppoſed, that if Laban purſued and overtook them, in having recourſe to them, ſhe might obtain pardon. But Laban, a day after the departure of Jacob and his wives, had notice thereof; and being therewith ſore agrieved, he purſued after them, intending to aſſail them by force, and on the ſeventh day he overtook them upon a certain hill where they ſat them down to take their reſt, in that it was evening: but God appearing to him in a dream, gave him counſell to uſe no violence, neither towards his ſon in law, nor his daughters; but rather to pacifie his ire towards them, and to liſten to a peaceable accord betwixt himſelf and Jacob: aſſuring him that if in contempt of Jacobs weakneſſe he ſhould lift up his arm to aſſail him, that he himſelf would joyn with Jacob to B yield him ſuccours.

24 Laban purſueth Jacob, but God deliverеth him from his purpoſe.

The next day, after that Laban had received this oracle from the mouth of God, as ſoon as it was day, he called Jacob unto him, to the end they might confer together (hiding nothing from him which the night before he had beheld in his dream.) As ſoon as Jacob was come unto him under ſafe conduct, he began to accuſe him; alledging that he had received him into his houſe, at ſuch time as he came unto him being poor and naked of all means: and how he had given him great abundance of goods. I have (ſaith he) given thee my daughters in marriage, hoping by that means to increaſe thy love towards me more and more; but thou haſt had neither reſpect of thy mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and me, neither of the wives which thou haſt eſpouſed, neither of thy children whoſe grandfather I am; but haſt dealt with me after an injurious and hoſtile manner, driving away that which appertained unto me, ſeducing my daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carry away my houſhold gods with them, which both I and my predeceſſours have ſerved and honoured; and even as much, as men of war would not have done unto their enemies, that haſt thou done unto me: yea thou that art my kinſman, my ſiſters ſon, the husband of my daughters, my pledge, and my familiar ſervant, haſt dealt thus with me. On the other ſide Jacob alledged for himſelf, that God had not onely made impreſſion in his heart, but that all men alſo are wholy addicted to the love of their countrey; and that after ſo long ſpace of time, it ſeemed good unto him to viſit his native ſoil. And as concerning that crime (ſaith he) which thou objecteſt againſt me, as touching the prey, if D any other but thy ſelf be judge, thou ſhalt be convicted to have dealt unjuſtly with me: for whereas thou oughteſt to have rewarded me, for the maintenance and increaſe I have made of thy goods, haſt thou not done us great wrong to envie us a little part and portion thereof? And as concerning thy daughters; know this, that they have not followed me by reaſon they have been conveighed away by ſubtiltie, but under that love and dutie which married wives bear unto their husbands: they do not therefore onely follow me, but they come after their children. Theſe things alledged he for himſelf. Further he replied and accuſed Laban, becauſe that being his mothers brother, and having given his daughters to wife, he had notwithſtanding bitterly vexed him by his ſevere commandments, under which he had been obedient during the ſpace of twentie yeers, that the troubles he had endured under E colour of marriage with Rachel had been cumberſome unto him; yet notwithſtanding that it was but a trifle in reſpect of that which he ſuffered afterwards; which had he born him an envious affection or hoſtile hatred, he could very well have eſcaped. In effect, Laban had dealt moſt maliciouſly with Jacob. For ſeeing that God aſſiſted him in all that he enterprized, Laban promiſed to give him all the cattell that were born white, and ſometime that which was brought forth black: and when as that which Jacob had named and choſen did increaſe, then did not Laban perform his promiſe unto him, but deferred him over to the next yeers increaſe, by reaſon he had alwayes a reſpect of the greater flock, and promiſed that which he hoped would not come to paſſe, and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the gods, he told him that he might make ſearch for them.

F This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel underſtanding thereof, thruſt the ſaid gods into a ſack, and made them to be carried on a Camels back, and ſhe ſate upon them, ſaying, that ſhe was indiſpoſed, by reaſon that at that time ſhe had her naturall purgations. And for this cauſe Laban deſiſted from ſearching any further, ſuppoſing his daughter being ſo affected would not conceal or ſet her ſelf ſo neer things that were ſo ſacred: and he made a covenant with Iacob, that none of them ſhould call to remembrance the interchangeable unkindneſſes that had paſt betwixt them, but that he ſhould cheriſh his daughters, all which they bound with an oath. This covenant was made upon a certain mountain, where they reared a pillar in the form of an altar: whence it came to paſs that this pillar was called Galaad, that 45.46.47 is to ſay, the hill of witneſſe, from whence the Countrey of Galaad had taken his name even untill this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banquetted together, G Laban returned back again into his own Countrey.

But as Jacob travelled towards the countrey of Canaan, he encountred many visions, which presaged unto him good hope and fortunes to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, The field of God. And being desirous to know how his brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to sound and gather the exact truth thereof, by reason he stood in fear lest the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signifie unto Esau, that Jacob (deeming it to be a thing inconvenient to live with his brother, who was displeased with him) had of his own free will forsaken the countrey, and that at this present he was upon his return, thinking that the length of time were sufficient to procure a reconciliation between them. He therefore led with him H his wives and children, with all those riches which God had given him; offering himself unto Esau with all that of most esteem which he had, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to him to impart unto his brother a part of those commodities, which he had received at Gods hands. All which they signified unto Esau, who rejoyced very much thereat, and went forth to meet his brother, accompanied with four hundered armed men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meet him, attended by so many men at arms, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, lest any detriment should happen unto him, studying every way to defend both him, and his, from invasion. Whereupon dividing his troups, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow speedily after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselves to the troup that followed. I

13. After this manner having ordered all things about him, He sent certain with presents to his brother, namely, with beasts of charge, and a great number of divers kinds of four-footed beasts, (which for their rarenesse might work more content and admiration in those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountred thus in ranks, they might seem to be of a greater number then they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might serve to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched foremost, that they should use courteous salutation towards Esau. Having thus all the day disposed his troups, as soon as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the River of Jaboch: but Jacob, who was left hindmost, was encountred with a vision, in which he K wrastled with an apparition, and he became victor.

17,18. Jacob reconcileth his brother with rewards.

Jacob wrastleth with an Angel, and is called Israel.

Now this vision spake unto him, exhorting him to rejoyce at that which had hapned unto him, assuring him that he had not atchieved an easie matter, but that he had surmounted
28. an Angel of God, which was a sign of great good which would befortune him, and that his posteritie should be invincible, and that never man whatsoever he were, should overcome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say, according to the Hebrews, a resister of an Angel. These things were foretold unto Jacob upon his request, who perceiving also that he was an Angel of God, prayed him to inform him of that which should happen unto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Jacob took great pleasure thereat,
30. and called the place Phanuel, that is to say, face of God: and for that in wrastling he had hurt L his broad nerve, he afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our nation do never feed thereon.

A went uuto Jacob, praying him to joyn Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his ſonne Sichem. Jacob not daring to contradict him by reaſon of his authority and quality; and on the other ſide, not thinking it to be either a thing lawful, or convenient, to match his daughter with a ſtranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to conſult thereupon. Hereon the King departed, hoping that Jacob would liſten to the marriage. But Jacob having diſcovered unto his ſonnes the raviſhment of their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, deſired them to deliberate amongſt themſelves, what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon ſome held their peace, not knowing what to ſay; but Simeon and Levi (the brothers of the ſame wombe with their ſiſter) complotted together this practiſe: In as much as it B was a feſtival, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleaſure, and banquetting, they iſſued by night upon their firſt guards, and killed them that were abed; and from thence entering into the city, they killed all the males (and with them the King and his ſonne) but to the women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledgde of their father, they brought their ſiſter back again. Jacob was very much aſtoniſhed at this accident, ſo ſtrangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared unto him, and comforted him, and commanded him, that he ſhould purifie his tents, and accompliſh thoſe ſacifices which he had vowed to perform, at ſuch time when firſt he went into Meſopotamia, and the viſion appeared unto him. Whileſt then he cleanſed thoſe which followed him, he found the gods of Laban, which (beſides his knowledge) Rachel had C ſtolne, and hid them in Sichem, in the earth, under an oak.

How Esau and Jacob, Isaac's sons, divided their inheritance: and how Idumæa fell to Esaus lot, and Canaan to Jacobs.

The year of the world, 2230. before Christs Nativity, 1734.

BUt when Isaac was dead the sonnes divided their habitations among themselves, and were neither of them content with that which they inherited by their father: but Esau leaving the City of Hebron to his brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was Lord of the Countrey of Idumæa; which he named by his name (for it was sirnamed Edom) for H the occasion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day sore wearied, travelled, and hungry, from hunting: and finding his brother dressing for himself a messe of lentil pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreased and incensed his appetite; he required them at his hands, that he might eat them. But he taking the opportunity and occasion of his brother Esaus hunger, constrained him to forsake his birth-right, and to sell him the same, on condition, he should give him what to eat. Esau then transported with famine, surrendred unto him his birth-right, and confirmed it with a solemne oath. And thereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockery, called him Edom, by reason of his red meat; for Edom in Hebrew, signifieth red. His countrey likewise was called Edom. But the I Greeks to the end they might make the name more current, called it Idumæa. He became the father of five children, of whom he had three by his wife Alibamma, whose names were Jaus, Jolamus and Choræus: as touching the other two, Aliphaces was the sonne of Aza: and Raguel, of Mosametha: these children had Esau. Aliphaces had five legitimate children, Theman, Omar, Ophus, Jotham, Ocavaxes, (for Amelech was illegitimate, born by one of his concubines, whose name was Themana.) These dwelt in the part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitus; and in that part, which by reason of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For Idumæa being in times past a land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorow the whole countrey: and the particular provinces of the same, kept the names of those that first inhabited the same.

CHAP. II.

Joseph, the youngest of Jacobs children, is envied by his brothers, Gen.37.

The year of the world, 2206. before the Nativity of Christ, 1658.

BUt Jacob attained to that felicity, that scarcely any other had been so happy; for he surpassed all the inhabitants of that countrey in riches: and by reason of the vertues of his children, he was both envied and regarded. For, they were accomplished in all perfections, animated and endowed with stout hearts, prepared to execute any work of the hand, and to endure all sorts of travel: finally, all of them were furnished with knowledge and providence. But God had such care of him, and so diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which seemed unto him to be grievous and contrary, L
he brought to an issue prosperous for him, and encreaseful for his riches; and brought to passe, that both he and his children were the first motive to our ancestors to forsake the land of Egypt, for that cause which here ensueth. Jacob having begotten Joseph of Rachel, loved him entirely, both in respect of the beauty of his body, as also of the ornaments and vertues of his spirit; and besides both those, his prudence, wherein he out-stripped all his other brothers. This cordial affection of his father, moved envy and hatred amongst his brothers towards him. And besides these, the dreams which he had seen, and told both to his father and brethren, which fore-prophecied unto him a singular felicity. For, it is the common custome of men to be jealous of their prosperity, with whom they are familiar. M

Now the visions which Joseph saw in his dream, were these. Being sent by his father, in the company of his brothers, to reap corn in the time of harvest, he saw a vision (farre different from those which accustomably happen in sleep) which (as soon as he awoke) he told unto his brethren, to the end they should interpret it. He told them therefore, that he thought in his dream the night past, that his sheaf of corn was setled in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs runne towards his, and worshipped the same. Which vision of his, seemed to foretell him of his ample fortune; and how he should obtain the Lordship over all of them. But they concealed all these things from Joseph; making shew that they could in no sort interpret the dream: but being by themselves apart, they breathed forth ad v.5. ad 9. Josephs dream.

A forth contrary imprecations; wiſhing that nothing of that which they interpreted, as touching his dream, might take effect, but perſevering more and more in envie and hatred towards him. But God(oppposing his power againſt their envy)ſent Joſeph a ſecond and more ſtrange viſion: for he dreamed, that the Sun, the moon, and eleven of the ſtarres deſcended down to the earth, and humbled themſelves before him. Which viſion he revealed to his father in the preſence of his brethren, (without ſuſpition of any hatred in them towards him) and beſought him to interpret unto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Jacob, he greatly rejoyced at this dream,by reaſon he conceived in his mind the interpretation thereof, and(in comparing and alluding his conjectures not raſhly, but with prudence) he rejoyced at thoſe great matters which were ſignified by that dream: which foretold that his ſon Joſeph
B ſhould be highly fortunate,and happy;& that the time ſhould come,in which his father,mother, and brethren ſhould honour him, and worſhip before him. For,he compared the moon (which ripeneth and encreaſeth all things that grow) to his mother; and the Sun (which giveth form and force) to his father. And as touching his brothers, who were eleven in number, he compared them to the eleven ſtars, (which received their force both from the ſun and the moon.) Neither did Jacob without judgement and conſideration, ſo interpret this viſion. But Joſephs brothers were highly agrieved at this preſage, conceiving as hainouſly and hatefully thereof, as if this felicity had been portended to a ſtranger and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatſoever, being as well allied in feli-
C city unto him, as in conſanguinity. Whereupon they reſolved on his death and deſtruction: and having complotted theſe counſels amongſt themſelves, and gathered in their harveſt, they retired themſelves with their flocks,towards Sichem,(which was a part of that countrey very fit to nouriſh and feed their cattel; where they kept their flocks without giving any notice of their departure to their father. But he perceiving that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tidings, being ſorrowful and careful of his ſons, he ſent Joſeph to the flocks, to underſtand how they did, and how their affairs proſpered.

Ruben diſſwadeth his brothers death.

BUt ſo ſoon as they ſaw their brother coming towards them, they rejoyced, not as at the arrival of one of their houſhold friends, ſent unto them by their father, but as if their enemy had encountred them; who by the will of God was delivered into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity. But Ruben, the eldeſt amongſt them, ſeeing their diſpoſition and conſpiracy to kill him, endeavoured to diſſwade them; ſetting before their eies, how hainous and wicked the enterpriſe was, and what hatred they
E might incurre thereby. For (ſaid he) if before God and before men it be a wicked and deteſtable thing, to lay hands on, and to murther a ſtranger; how much more hainous a crime will it be held for us,to be convicted to be the murtherers of our brother? whoſe death will heap ſorrow on our fathers head, and draw our mother into great grief and deſolation through the loſſe of her ſonne robbed and bereft from her, beyond the ordinarie courſe of men. For which cauſe, he prayed them to be adviſed in theſe things; and that they would conſider in their minds, what thing might happen, if this child, who was fair, vertuous, and young, ſhould be done to death: praying them to give over this unnaturall reſolution, and to fear God, who was both the judge and witneſſe of their deliberation intended againſt their brother: and that if they would deſiſt from this hainous act, God would take pleaſure F in their repentance and reconcilement: but if they proceeded in their enterpriſe, he aſſured them, that he would puniſh them like fratricides; ſince nothing is hidden from his providence; whether it be committed in the deſart, or attempted in the City. For, whereſoever men are, there is it alwaies to be thought, that God likewiſe is. Further,that when they ſhould have perpetrated this fact, they ſhould alwaies have their conſciences as an armed adverſary againſt them, which never would forſake them, whether they were good, or whether ſuch as theirs would be,if they ſhould fortune to murther their brother. Furthermore he alledged, that it was an impious fact to kill a mans own brother, although he had done him injury; and much more meritorious, to forgive a mans friend, that had offended againſt him. Moreover he ſaid, that Joſeph had done them no wrong, whoſe tender years rather required care and compaſſion at their hands, then hate and tyranny. Beſides that, the G cauſe of his ſlaughter would aggravate their offence, if it ſhould be known, that for envie of his future felicity they ſhould take away his life, all which good hap they likewiſe might participate, by reaſon of conſanguinitie: and that it was their duty to think, that whatſoever bleſſing God imparted to Joſeph, was theirs; and that for that cauſe they were to imagine, that God would be more diſpleaſed againſt them, if they ſhould endeavour to deprive him of his life, whom he had eſteemed and adjudged worthy of proſperity to come. Ruben alledging theſe and many other things, beſought them, and laboured to divert them from ſhedding their brothers blood. But ſeeing that all theſe his motives could in no ſort mollifie them, but that they haſtened the rather to commit and perpetrate the murther; he counſelled them, that at leaſt-wiſe they ſhould allot him ſome milder kind of death: telling them, that he endeavoured all what in him lay, at the firſt to diſſwade them. But ſince it was H throughly reſolved among them, that he ſhould not live; that leſſe miſchief ſhould follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counſel: for by that means their will ſhould have effect, yet a more mild, and leſſe hurtful, in compariſon of murther; that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keep them immaculate, by caſting him into the next pit, and there leaving him in the hands of death. To this counſel, all of them agreed. So Reuben took Joſeph, and bound him with cords, and let him down eaſily into a pit, which was drie: which done he departed, to ſeek out a more convenient place for paſture.

v.22. Ruben perſwadeth them to caſt Joſeph into a pit. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 3.

But when Ruben was gone, Juda one of Jacobs ſons, (eſpying certain merchants of Arabia, of the Countrey of the Iſmaelites, who from the countrey of Galadena carried ſpicery and Syrian merchandiſe into Egypt) counſelled his brothers to draw up Joſeph out of the Well, and to ſell him to thoſe Arabians: aſſuring them, by that means it would come to paſſe, that Joſeph ſhould die the farther off from them, amongſt ſtrangers: and as touching themſelves, they ſhould be exempt from that pollution. Which counſel of his being commended by them all, they drew Joſeph out of the pit, and ſold him to the Arabians for the ſumme of 20. ſilverlings, at ſuch time as he was ſeuenteen years of age. Now had Reuben reſolved in himſelf to ſave Joſeph, without his brothers privity: for which cauſe coming by night unto the pit, he called him with a loud voice; and ſeeing that he gave him no anſwer, he began to conjecture with himſelf, that his brethren had done him to death; he reproved them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gave over his K mourning. After theſe things were thus brought to paſſe, the brethren conſulted among themſelves, in what ſort they might clear themſelves from their fathers ſuſpition; and concluded among themſelves to tear the coat wherewith Joſeph was attired at ſuch time as he came unto them, and which they had taken from him when they caſt him into the Well; to the end, that having defiled it in the blood of a goat, they might afterwards bear it unto their father, and ſhew it him, to the end he might ſuppoſe, that Joſeph was ſlain by wild beaſts. Which done, they came unto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his ſonnes misfortunes) and told him, that they had not ſeen their brother Joſeph, neither could they aſſure him what miſhap had befallen him: but that notwithſtanding, they had found his jerkin, altogether be-bloudied and torn; which made them ſuſpect, that he was ſlain by ſome wild L beaſts, if ſo be he were ſent unto them attired in that coat.

But Jacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more ſucceſſeful tidings, in that he ſuppoſed and hoped that Joſeph had onely been captive) gave over this opinion, and took the coat for a moſt aſſured teſtimony of his ſonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at ſuch time as he ſent him to his brothers: for which cauſe he lamented Joſeph, from that time forward, as being dead, and as if he had not any more ſons. And ſuch was the grief of his heart, that he conceived no conſolation in the reſt, but ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded by the brothers, that Joſeph had been ſlain by ſavage beaſts. 27,28. Joſeph is ſold in Egypt to Putiphar.

Now Joſeph was ſold by the merchants, and bought by Putiphar, (an Egyptian lord, and a ſteward of king Pharaohs houſhold) who held him in high eſtimation, and trained him up in all liberal ſciences, ſuffering him to live, not after a ſervile, but liberal manner, and committing unto his charge the care of his houſhold; all which favours he made uſe of. Yet was he no waies diverted by theſe his priviledges and promotions, from his innated vertue; teſtifying hereby, that prudence doth not ſubmit to adverſe fortune, if a Man uſe the ſame orderly, and not at that time onely when fortune fawneth and flattereth.

All which ſhe ſuppoſed and imagined, having onely regard of that ſervile condition wherein at that preſent he was, and not of his manners, which continued alwaies entire, notwithſtanding any change that could happpen unto him. For which cauſe ſhe diſcovered unto him her deſire, and deſired him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refuſed her demand, alledging, that it were a moſt wicked requital of him towards his Maſter, if it ſhould come to paſſe, that he who had bought him, & ſo greatly honoured him, ſhould receive ſo great an injurie and outrage. For which cauſe, he exhorted her to conquer her appetite, depriving her of all hope of ever compaſſing her concupiſcence; B alledging unto her, That deſire is then leſſe active, when hope is extinguiſhed; avowing, that he had rather ſuffer all the miſchiefes that might be imagined, then to conſent or condiſcend unto her in that wickedneſſe. And although (ſaid he) it be undecent for a ſervant to contradict the will of his Miſtris, yet, that the filthineſſe of the fact did diſſwade him from attempting the ſame. But this his repulſe did more and more inflame her, for that ſhe ſuppoſed that Joſeph ſhould not deny her: and her diſordinate affections encreaſing daily, ſhe deviſed and complotted a new means, in hope to bring her love to her deſired iſſue.

Whereas therefore a ſolemn and publick feaſt was at hand, wherein (according to cuſtome) the Ladies were wont to dignifie the ſolemnity by their aſſiſtance; ſhe fained a ſick- C neſſe, perſwading her husband thereunto, hoping by that means ſhe might have the better opportunity (in being ſolitary, and alone) to ſolicite Joſeph: which falling out accordingly (as ſhe had her ſelf deſired) ſhe began to court and compaſſe him by theſe flattering and fawning allurements and perſwaſions: telling him, That he had done well, if (upon her firſt requeſt) he had obeyed her, without any contradiction, in reſpect of her dignity who required the ſame, and her incredible paſſion, which had ſo far commanded her, that notwithſtanding ſhe were his Miſtris, ſhe ſhould indignifie and forget her ſelf ſo much as to ſolicite him: that now he ſhould behave himſelf more wiſely and better; if in amends of his forepaſſed obſtinacy he now at laſt would conſent. For if he reſpected this her ſecond ſummons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (ſaith ſhe) I have D fained ſickneſſe to this end, to ſolicite and prefer thy company before a publick triumph. Or if at firſt thou didſt miſtruſt me, thou maiſt hereby conceive that I do not malicioufly tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the ſame affection. For which cauſe either make choice of this preſent pleaſure, and be obſequious to her that loveth thee, under hope of further preferments, or be aſſured of my hate and revenge, if thou preferreſt thy opinion of chaſtity before my favour. For be aſſured that thy chaſtity ſhall profit thee nothing, if I ſhall accuſe thee to my husband, and avow, that thou haſt ſought to violate me: for although thy allegations be more true, yet ſhall my words be of more force, and my accuſations more acceptable in Putiphars ears then thine. But neither by theſe words, nor her tears the witneſſes of her vowes, could Joſeph be perverted, neither could remorſe over-work him, nor terrour E compell him to forſake his purpoſed chaſtity, but that he conſtantly reſiſted againſt thoſe unjuſt afflictions, wherewith ſhe threatned him: chooſing rather to ſuffer any miſery whatſoever, then to be priſoned with the poſſeſſion of her offered adulteries, being well aſſured that he was worthy of extream puniſhment, if on a womans entreaty he ſhould condiſcend to any ſuch treacherie. He likewiſe admoniſhed her of her duty, alledging the lawes, rights, and cuſtomes of Matrimony, willing her rather to reſpect them, then her momentany luſt: for that the one was ſpeedily followed with repentance, proceeding ſuddenly of grief, not amendment of ſin, with a continual and great fear likewiſe, leſt the fact ſhould be diſcovered: whereas the company ſhe might have with her husband, was void of danger, and attended by a conſcience as well before God, as men. Moreover, that it was more convenient F for her to governe and command him as his Lady and Miſtris, rather then to be ſhamed, in making him the Secretary of their common ſinne: for that it is more convenient to be aſſured in the confidence of a good life; then in ſecret to commit ſin. In theſe and ſuch words ſought he to abate the brunt of her furious affection, and to revoke her from her depraved fancies, to ſubmit to the law of reaſon: but ſhe, the more inſtantly he diſſwaded, the more earneſtly invaded him; and where by no means ſhe could pervert him by words, ſhe laid violent hands upon him, to conſtrain him perforce. But Joſeph unable to endure any longer he intemperancy of the woman, leaving his Garment behind him, whereby ſhe held him) rake ſuddenly out of the chamber. She, partly impelled by the grief of repulſe, partly affrighted with fear, leſt her laſciviouſneſſe ſhould be made known to her husband, decreed firſt

She therefore sat her down sad and perplexed, colouring the grief of her defrauded lust, under the cloak of indignation, for her attempted honour and violated chastity. Now when her husband came home, and (being troubled in mind to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof: Live thou no longer (said she) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slave, who attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great benevolence thou hast entertained him; yea, who was to be esteemed more ingrate then ingratitude, except every way he approved himself faithfull unto thee: yet hath he not forborn to offer injury, no, not to thine own Wife; and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence: whereby it manifestly appeareth, that the moderation which hitherto he pretended, rather proceeded of servile fear, then native modesty. And that which hath the more emboldned him, is, in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast favoured him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiving that he was preferred before all thine ancient servants, he thought it lawful likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy Wife. And to procure more credit to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behind him, at such time as he sought to violate her. But Putiphar intangled by the words and tears of a woman, and attributing too much to his wives dissembling love, omitting the further and faithful inquisition of the truth, after he had first of all praised his wives faith and loyalty, he cast Joseph, thus condemned of haynous wickednesse, into the prison I of malefactors, esteeming his wives chastity, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witnesse of her approved honesty.

vers. 20. Joseph is cast into prison. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4.

But Joseph committing his innocency unto God, neither took care how to excuse himself, neither to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessity of his bonds, he was onely comforted with this one hope, namely, that God was more powerfull then they that had imprisoned him; whose providence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that, wherein he imployed him, as also the dignity of his form, loosed him out of bonds, and by that means in some sort lessened his miserie; giving him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of the prisoners had. Now, when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labour) conferred together (as men in misery are wont to do) and questioned K among themselves, of the cause of their damnation; a certain Butler near about the King (condemned by him, in displeasure to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Joseph: and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and provident man, he told him his Dream, praying him, that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that he would expound it unto him; lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the Kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from heaven by Dreames. For he said, that in his sleep he beheld three great clusters of Grapes hanging on three several branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and ready to be gathered; and that him thought he pressed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, having strained the Must, he offered it to the King, and that he willingly drank thereof. Now, when he had shewed him his vouchsafe to interpret his Vision unto him. Joseph answered him; that he should be of good courage; willing him to expect, that within three dayes he should be delivered from his boads, and be admitted again to the Kings service, and restored to his former credit. For The year of the world, 2238. before Christs Nativity, 1736. he interpreted that the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for mans use; for that by the mediation thereof, faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolved: furthermore, that troubles and sorrowes were assiwaged by the use, thereof; in stead of which, pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest me that the King received, being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore that thou hast a good Dream offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliverance from misery within three M dayes, according to the number of those Clusters which thou gatheredst in thy Dream.

Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as soon as the event hath approved this my prediction to be faithfull and unfained; and when thou art at liberty, forget us not, that are left here to lie in misery, who departest to enjoy thy foretold felicity: for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednesse, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modesty; in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I lived, and his credit who committed me to prison, then mine own pleasure. And thus the Butler, as it became

Now a certain other ſervant, who had the command of the Kings Bakers, and living in the ſame priſon with the Butler, conceiving ſome hope through Joſephs ſo happy interpretation (for that he likewiſe had ſeen a viſion) deſired him to expound unto him what interpretation was to be had of a dream, which he had the night paſt, which he expreſſed in theſe words. Me thought (ſaid he) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which, two were repleniſhed with bread, and the other with fleſh, and divers other kind of cates, ſuch as are prepared for Kings: But the birds of the ayr hovering round about me, devoured all the victualls, being nothing appaled by me, although I drove them from thence. Which ſaid, he expected a preſage no leſſe fortunate then the former.

The Bakers Dream. v. 16.

But Joſeph (after he had conjectured upon the circumſtances of the dream, and foretold
B him that he would rather have informed him of more ſucceſſeful fortunes, then his dreame did intend:) told him that he had only two dayes left him, wherein he was to live. For theſe were deſignated by the two baskets; but by the third, that he ſhould be hanged and devoured by the foules, which he could not drive from him. Neither did it otherwiſe fall out with both of them, then Joſeph had foretold: For upon the prefixed day, the King (celebrating the feaſt of his nativity) commanded that the Baker ſhould be hanged: but as touching the Butler, he delivered him from his bonds, and reſtored him to his former office. But God delivered Joſeph (after he had for the ſpace of two years ſpent his time in the miſery of the priſon: and was in the mean ſpace no wayes aſſiſted by the ungrateful Butler) by preordinating this means and manner of his liberty. Whereas King Pharaoh had that
C night in his ſleep ſeen two viſions, and had alſo received the interpretation thereof, forgetting the one, he onely remembred him of the dreames, which in his opinion had no fortunate ſignification. Whereupon early in the morning (calling before him the learneſt among the Egyptians) he required the interpretation thereof. Now when he could in no ſort be ſatisfied by them, the King was the more and more moved: which when the Butler perceived, he remembred him of Joſeph, and of his wiſdome and prudence in theſe ſorts of conjectures; and repairing unto the King told him of Joſeph and of his viſion, and the event thereof, which he had whileſt he was in priſon, together with Joſephs interpretation; and how the ſame day, the maſter of the Bakers condemned to the gallowes, gave greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept priſoner as a ſlave by Putiphar the maſter of his houſhold, and that he ſaid how amongſt the Hebrewes he was deſcended of good and ho-
D nourable parents. Command him therefore (ſaid he) to be ſent for, neither deſpiſe the man for his preſent miſery, for thou mayeſt manifeſtly underſtand by him, the ſignification of thy Dreames. Whereupon the King ſent for him preſently, and friendly taking him by the hand, he ſpake unto him after this manner: Good young man, in that I underſtand by the report of my ſervant, that thou art prudent; ſhew me the interpretation of my Dreames in ſuch manner as thou diſcoveredſt his unto him, and thou ſhalt do me a high pleaſure: but beware thou neither conceale any thing for fear, or ſpeak ought for flattery, or to feed me with falſhoods, but tell me all things truly, although they ſhall in a ſort breed my diſcontent to heare them. Me ſeemed that I walked by a river ſide, and that I ſaw ſeven well
E fed and fat kine, which retired themſelves from the flood into the paſture: and again, me thought that ſeven others came from the paſture to encounter them, who were very leane and ugly to behold, who when they had devoured the ſeven others that were fat and great, yet never the more increaſed, but were all of them miſerably vexed with hunger. But after this viſion being awaked out of my ſleep, and troubled in my minde, thinking with my ſelf, what that viſion might ſignifie, being ſeized by little and little by a pleaſant ſlumber, I fell a ſleep once again, And again, I ſaw a viſion more prodigious then the former, which doth likewiſe trouble and terrifie me the more. For I ſaw ſeven eares ſprung out of one root, that hung down and bowed their heads, becauſe they were loaden with grain ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared ſeven other, weak, and languiſhing for want of F dew, who devouring thoſe other great and full ears, left me highly aſtoniſhed. Hereunto Joſeph anſwered: This Dream (O King) although it hath been ſeen in two figures, yet ſo it is that it importeth one and the ſame accident, which is to enſue. For both thoſe Oxen (which are creatures born and bred up for the plough and labour) which you ſaw devoured by the leaner, and thoſe eares of corn conſumed by the weaker, fore-ſignifie a famine and ſcarcity in Egypt for ſo many years, as there were Oxen and ears of corn in good plight: ſo that the fertility of theſe good years ſhall be conſumed by the ſterility of ſo many other yeares, according to their number; and there ſhall be ſuch ſcarcity of neceſſary proviſion vision, that it shall be hard to prevent and supply their defects: all which is signified by those G seven lean kine, who having devoured the good, could not be satisfied by the same. All these things God foretelleth unto men, not to the end they should be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might provide for themselves, to the end they might more easily prevent the imminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay up and store the abundance of the plentiful years, Egypt shall not feel the penury that shall follow. And when as the King (admiring at Josephs prudence and wisdome) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plenty, how to prevent and redresse the future sterility: he warned and counselled him, that the Egyptians should use parsimony, and that that which remained of those years superfluity, might be reserved for future necessities. He counselled him also to binde the husbandmen, that they should hoard up their corn in their barnes, and onely to distribute to the people as much as was sufficient, and no more Hereupon the H King (not onely praysing Josephs counsel, but also his interpretation of his dreames) made him Lord and Commissary of all his store; and commanded him to provide whatsoever he thought necessary in that behalf either of his own or of the peoples: assuring him that he thought no man more necessary to execute this counsel, then himself who was the author thereof: Having therefore this authority giveu him by the King to use his own signet, and to be cloathed in purple, he was conducted through all the countrey upon a Chariot: and he assembled the laboures of corne, and distributed to every one by measure, that which they wanted for seed-corne, and for their nourishment, without letting any man understand for what cause he did it.

v.47.48,49. By Josephs counsel the succeeding scarcity is made more tolerable.

v.42,43. Joseph is intitled by Pharaoh to great honours.

Hecio & Rufinus, chap. 5.

About this time he had already attained to thirty years old, being held in great honour I by the King, and was for his incredible prudence, firnamed by him Psontom Phanechus, which signifieth, The discoverer of hidden things: he was allso honoured with a wife of great dignity: for by the procuration of the King, he took to wife a virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan Priest, whose name was Asaneth, by whom he begat chiidren also, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manasses which signifieth Oblivion (because attaining better fortune, he grew in oblivion of his former misery:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which signifieth Return, for that he was restored to the liberty of his ancestors.) Now when as according to Josephs interpretation, the seven years K of plenty and affluence were overpassed in Egypt; the eighth year of famine began to infest the land, and for that the evill was unexpected, the headlong multitude grievously travelled with hunger and misery, began to flock about the Kings gates and garners. Hereon the King called for Joseph, who presently distributing grain to those that wanted it, became without controversie, the father and conserver of the commonaltie. Neither did he onely make merchandize with those that inhabited that countrey: but with strangers also, deeming that the whole race of mankind was allied the one with the other: and that it was convenient, that such as wanted, should be succoured by their meanes who had better fortune. And because the same calamity both oppressed Canaan and other Kingdomes of the world, Jacob also sent all his sons into Egypt to fetch corn; (as soon as he understood that strangers also had liberty to traffique in that place) onely with himself he retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german unto Joseph: who L as soon as they arrived in Egypt, repaired unto Joseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corn (for nothing was done without his expresse command) for even then found each man fit occasion to honour the King, when they bethought themselves how to honour Joseph. He taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing lesse then of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and besides, no one of them might suspect that he had attained to so great dignity: determined to try and tempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For he both denied them his licence to buy corn, and commanded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were gathered of di- M vers nations, and that they feigned kindred: for how can it be (saith he) that a private man should bring up so many worthy sons; which felicity scarcely and very seldome is granted unto Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate he lived, during the time of his absence; and what was become of Benjamin his brother: for he was sore atraid, lest they had offered the same hard measure to the Lad, which they had inflicted upon him. But they were strucken with a mighty fear, bethinking them on their imminent peril, supposing that they had travelled this long journey all in vain: and for that they saw their accusation must be answered; Ruben the eldest of them, began after this manner to plead their common cause. Neither are we come hither (said he)

A (ſaid he) as ſpies, neither under pretence to indamage the King; but dire famine (whoſe furie we ſeek to prevent) hath compelled us to come into this countrey, grounding our ſelves on your humanitie; who (as we have heard) have not only made offer of ſale of corn, and meanes of ſuſtenance to your citizens: but alſo unto all ſtrangers. And that we are brothers, and born of the ſame father, our very countenances teſtifie no leſſe, in that they vary not very much the one from the otherr. Our father, by name, is Iacob; by Nation, an Hebrew: who begat us, his twelve ſons, on foure women: who, while they all were in ſafetie, our affaires were fortunate and proſperous; but one of them being dead, whoſe name was Ioſeph, our domeſticall fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our father languiſheth in continuall lamentations, whoſe teares do no leſſe afflict us, then in times paſt the untimely death of
B our deareſt brother did affect us. Now are we come to buy corne, having left in our fathers cuſtodie the youngeſt of our brothers, called Benjamin. That thus it is, if ſo thou pleaſe to ſend any one unto our houſe, thou maiſt be aſſured. Thus ſpake Ruben, both on his own and his brothers behalfe, whereby he might exempt from Ioſeph his ſiniſter opinion of them: who knowing that both his father and brother were in health, commanded them to be ſhut in priſon, under pretence to call them to further examination, upon his better leiſure. Some three dayes after (calling them before him) he began thus: Since (ſaith he) you proteſt, that you came not hither into this Kingdome on purpoſe, either to prejudice the King, or work Treaſons towords the State, and that you pretend your ſelves to be the ſons of one father: you ſhall induce me to beleeve, that your allegations be true, if leaving ſome one with me as pledg of your loyalties, (who ſhall be well entertained) you beare hence your deſired Corn
C unto your father, and returne againe unto me, bringing with you your brother, whom (as you ſay) you left behinde you: for this ſhall be an Argument that you faine not. Amazed at theſe words, and ſuppoſing that their extreme calamity was at hand, they lamented their fortunes; oftentimes expoſtulating amongſt themſelves, that the dire revenge of their brother, oppreſſed with undecent tyranny, was fallen upon them. Moreover, Ruben reprehended their too late and unprofitable penitencie, ſaying, That thoſe afflictions which God (the juſt revenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were conſtantly to be borne. After this manner ſpake they one unto another, ſuppoſing that no man was preſent who underſtood the Hebrew Tongue; and they all lamented, being inwardly touched with the words
D of Ruben; and condemned their perpetrated wickedneſſe, as if they had not been the authors of the fact: for which, at that time, they thought that God did moſt juſtly puniſh them. Ioſeph beholding them in this perplexitie, unable to diſſemble any longer his brotherly love, in that the teares already began to burſt out of his eyes, which at that time he deſired to conceale, he departed from among them.

Not long after, returning again unto them, he retained Simeon with him, who in the mean time ſhould remain as pledge with him, untill their back return; and giving them licence to buy their Corne, he commanded them to depart: giving withall a ſpeciall commandement to one of his ſervants, that the money which they had brought to buy Corn, ſhould ſecretly be ſhut up into their ſacks, and they permitted to depart; all which his ſervant performed. But Iacobs ſons returning into Chanaan, told their father all that which had hapned unto E them in Egypt, and how they were attached for ſpies, and traitors to that countrey: and that when they proteſted, that they were brethren, and that the eleventh was left at home with their father, they would not beleeve them. Moreover, that Simeon was left pledge with the Governour, untill Benjamin came thither to give teſtimonie of their truth: whereupon they deſired their father without contradiction or ſiniſter conceit, to ſend their younger brother with them. But Iacob was diſpleaſed with that which his ſons had done; and whereas he was not a little grieved that Simeon was left behinde, he thought it worſe then death alſo to be deprived of Benjamin; and neither could Ruben with his prayers (offering his ſons for pledges, that if any ſiniſter fortune ſhould fall upon Benjamin by the way, the Grandfather might revenge him on his children) perſwade Iacob to yeeld conſent: but they F uncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their money incloſed in their ſacks of corne. Now when corne began already to faile them; Iacob being compelled by force of famine, determined to ſend Benjamin with his other brothers: for it was unlawfull for them to return into Egypt, except they kept their covenant. And whereas neceſſitie preſſed them daily more and more, and his ſons ceaſed not inſtantly to call upon him; yet, as yet was he doubtfull and unreſolved: at laſt Iuda, a man vehement by nature, began more liberally to reproove his father, in that he was too careful of his brother, to whom nothing might happen without the will of God, whether it were abroad or at home: and that without reason he had care of his son Benjamin, in such sort as it was not possible for them to get ought out of Pharaohs countrey which was necessary for their nourishment; that he ought also to have care of the life of Simeon, lest whilest he dallied and delayed to send Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the mean time should be slain by the Egyptians. Moreover he exhorted him to commit the care of his son unto God, promising to bring him back again in safetie, or else to die together with him. Moreover he said, that certain gifts gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the juice of Mirabolans, Stacte, Terebinth, and Honey, should be sent as presents unto Joseph, together with the double price of their Corn. Thus shedding teares on both sides, they depart from their father, leaving him miserably tormented for the health of his sons; and contrariwise suspecting with themselves, lest through his absence their father should be slain with sorrow. In this perplexitie spent they a whole day. At last, the old man remained in the house wholly afflicted; and they travelling into Egypt, did mitigate their present griefe with the hope of better fortune: where no sooner were they arrived, but they repaired unto Joseph; being sore afraid, lest it should be laid to their charge, that under colour of fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former corne: which presently, before Josephs steward, they carefully excused, saying, That they found the money among the Wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks; which now, in discharge of their truth, they had brought back again. But he denying that he ever missed their money, and they being delivered from this fear, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was suddenly set at libertie, to converse among his brethren. Now, when Joseph was returned from the service of the King, they offer him presents: and inquiring of them, how their father did: they answered, that he was in health. Then perceiving that Benjamin was yet alive, whom he saw among them, he asked whether that were their younger brother: and hearing that it was he, he only uttered these words, That God had the providence of all things, and departed from them, being unwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which he could not any longer containe. Inviting them afterwards unto a Banquet, he commanded them to sit down in order, according as they were wont to do when they were with their father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honored Benjamin with a double share. After the Banquet, at such time as they were all layd down to rest, he commanded the steward to measure out the Wheat which every one should beare away with him, and to hide the price thereof again in their sacks: but in Benjamins sack, he commanded him to put his Cup wherein he most dilighted. Which he therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loves towards Benjamin; and whether they would stick unto him, being accused of theft, or leaving him behinde as a malefactor, return unto their father, as if the matter no wayes touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded it, early in the morning all Jacobs sons arose, and taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey, rejoycing as well at his restitution, as Benjamins return, whom they both promised and protested to bring back again to their father; when behold, suddenly a troupe of horsemen roundly beset them, amongst whom, was that servant who had hid the Cup in the sack. Now they being troubled by this sudden incursion, and asking them, why they set upon them whom they so lately had both invited and entertained so honourably? The Egyptians answered and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits received, and Josephs gentlenesse and humanity, were so wicked, as to return him injuries for his courtesies, threatning them, that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceived the Minister of the Table, yet could they not deceive God, and again asking them, whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished? In these, or such like speeches, the servant insulted over them. But they who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, That they wondred at the mans intemperancy, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keep back, no, not the price of their Corne, which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselves knew aught of that money; so far were they from purposely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought this inquisition would better satisfie them, then denyal, they bid them search their sacks; offering themselves, each of them, to suffer punishment, if any one of them were found guilty of the theft. This search which they offered, the Egyptians accepted; yet referred they the punishment, to be inflicted only on him who had done the injury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sack, at length they came to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his sack, but that they might seeme to discharge their dutie more cunningly. Now all the rest being secured in themselves, they onely as yet were carefull of their brother Benjamin; they hoped also, that

A that he would not be found guilty of falſhood: for which cauſe, they more freely upbraided their perſecutors; objecting unto them, how through their importunity they had been hindred the better part of their journey. Now as they ſearched Benjamins ſack, they found the Cup; whereupon all the brothers began to mourn and lament, both bewailing their brothers fortune, who was like preſently to ſuffer death for the theft; and their own miſhap, who having plighted their faith unto their father for Benjamins ſafe return, were compelled to falſifie the ſame through this preſent accident. And that which further increaſed their grief, was, that when as they moſt of all hoped to be free from dangers they were by fortunes envie thruſt into ſo great calamity; confeſſing themſelves to be the authors both of their fa-
B thers, and this their brothers misfortune; who never ceaſed to importune and compell their father (although hee were unwilling and reſiſted) to ſend the child with them.

The year of the world, 2238. before the Nativity of Chriſt 1726.

Now the horſemen having laid hands on Benjamin, led him unto Joſeph; whom his brothers preſently followed. Who beholding his brother thruſt into priſon, & the reſt bemoning them round about them in mourning habits: have you, ſaid he (O moſt wicked men) either ſo contemned my humanity, or Gods providence, as that you durſt attempt and offer ſuch an hainous injury againſt him, who entertained you with hoſpitality, and diſmiſſed you with benefits? To whom they anſwered, that they were ready to ſuffer puniſhment for Benjamin, calling again to their remembrance, Joſephs injuries, ſaying: that he was happy, who delivered by C death from life was exempt from all calamities: and that (if he lived) God inflicted that plague on them for his ſake. They ſaid alſo, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their father, becauſe that (to the former ſorrow, which he had conceived even untill that time of Joſephs death) they had alſo annexed this new miſery: neither did Ruben deſiſt to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickedneſſe which they had committed. But Joſeph told them that he diſmiſſed them all (ſaying that their journey was approved unto him) and that he only would be contented with the Lads puniſhment: for (ſaid he) neither is it reaſonable that he ſhould be delivered for the love of thoſe who had not offended: neither that they ſhould be puniſhed for him, who had done the theft, He commanded them therefore to depart, and promiſed them ſafe conduct on their way.

v. 11. Benjamin is attached for theft.

D Whileſt all of them were grieviouſly wounded with theſe words (ſo that ſcarcely one of them could ſpeak for ſorrow) Juda (who had perſwaded his father to ſend Benjamin with them and who amongſt the reſt was a man of confidence) purpoſed to expoſe himſelf to all danger, under reſolution to deliver his brother from peril: whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to Joſeph and ſpake thus: Dread Lord (quoth he) we confeſſe that we are all ready to ſuffer puniſhment (although we have not all of us committed the offence, but onely the youngeſt amongſt us) and although we ſuppoſe his life to be almoſt deſperate, yet our only hope as yet reſteth in your goodneſſe and clemency. For which cauſe, we beſeech you, that you will not only have compaſſion of us, but of your own nature, and that in this caſe you would be pleaſed to take counſel, not of your juſt indignation, but your native goodneſſe: governing your E wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and ſmall occurrences, are wont to ſubmit. Conſider, I pray you, whether it ſtand with your dignity to kill thoſe, who preſent themſelves to be puniſhed, and deſire in no ſort to live, except it be by the benefit of your mercy. Suffer not your ſelf to be deprived of this honour: that after you have delivered us from famine, and liberally furniſhed us with corn, ſo of your mercy likewiſe you have permitted us to return unto our family, being travelled by the ſame peril, and to bring them home ſuſtenance. For one and the ſame bounty is it to continue them in life, who are travelled with famine; and to forgive them death, who have merited it by their offences: to whom their wickedneſſe hath envied that bounty which you have heroically extended towards them. It is one and the ſame grace imparted by you in divers manners. For thou ſhalt
F ſave thoſe whom thou haſt fed; and that life which thou wouldeſt not ſuffer to fail by force of famine, thou ſhalt deliver and give again: whereby thy clemency may be more commendable, whileſt both thou giveſt life, & thoſe things likewiſe whereby life is maintained, Moreover, I think that God himſelf hath given thee this means to expreſſe thy vertue, that it may appear that thou ſetteſt lighter by the injuries offered unto thee, then by thy will to do good; and that thou art not liberal to them onely, who are poor and innocent. For although it be a great praiſe to yield ſuccor in adverſities; yet is a Prince no leſſe honoured by his clemency, eſpecially in a cauſe that concerneth his particular intereſt, for if they that remit ſmall offences, are followed by deſerved praiſe; what is it to reſtrain a mans ire in a capitall crime? doth it not moſt near approximate the divine clemency? And had I not good experience by Joſephs death, how grievouſly my father digeſteth the want of his children, I would not ſo earneſtly intreat for his ſafety, but ſo farre forth and no otherwiſe, but but as it might redound to the praise of thy clemency; and were there not some to whom our death would bring both grief and discontent, we were willing all of us to suffer punishment. But now whereas we have not so much commiseration of our selves (although as yet we be but young, and have not much tasted the pleasures, and fruit of this life) as of our wretched Parent, being drowned in yeares and cares, we offer up unto thee these our prayers in his name also, and beseech thee to grant us life, though at this day we are under thy justice for our offences. Assuredly he is a good man, and begat us, that we should be like unto him: worthy is he never to taste or be tried by any such calamity, who now through our absence, is discruciate with care and sorrow. Now, if so be he should receive any tidings either of our death, or the cause thereof, he will not endure any more to live: the infamie of our deaths will shorten his daies, and make his death by this means more unhappy; who rather then he should hear the rumours of our shame, would hasten his death, in supposing them. All these well considered, (although thou art justly moved by this offence) remit the revenge unto our father, and rather let thy pity towards him, then our iniquity towards thee, prevail with thee. Impart this honour to his old age; which if it be deprived of our presence, neither will, nor can desire to live: yield this respect to thy fathers memory; yea ascribe it to the very name of a father, wherewith thou art honoured: so God, the Father of all men, will blesse thee in that name and fortunate thee in thy increase; whom also thou shalt honour, if in respect of that common name, thou take compassion of our father, in considering the sorrow that he shall endure, if perhaps he shall be deprived of his children. It now lieth in your power to give us that, which you may deprive us of, by that power which God hath given you: and in doing us this favour, you shall imitate the nature of God; and in this respect, become like unto him. For, since it lieth in your power to do both the one and the other, it were better thou didst good then evill; and contenting thy self with thy power, not to remember or urge thy revenge: but only to think, that thy power was given thee, to keep and conserve men; and that the more mercy thou extendest towards many, the more honour thou redoublest on thy head. Now it lieth in thy power, by forgiving our brothers error, to give us all life. For neither can we be safe except he be saved; neither may we return home unto our father, except he return; but here must we suffer whatsoever our brother suffereth, Neither do we crave any other mercy at thy hand (dread Prince) if we be repulsed in this, but that thou wilt inflict one and the same punishment on us, in no other manner, then as if we had been partakers of the Felony: for this were more better for us, then that we our selves, through sorrow, should offer violence to our own souls. I will not alledge or urge his youth, or judgment, as yet unripned; neither will I infer, that pardon is usually granted unto such; but here will I make an end. That whether we be condemned, in that I have not sufficiently pleaded his cause, or whether we be absolved, we may wholly ascribe this grace to your favour and clemency: to the bounds of whose prayse, this likewise shall be added, That not only thou hast saved us; but also, in pardoning us of the punishment which we have justly deserved, hast had more care of us, then we our selves. It therefore it be thy pleasure to adjudge him to die, suffer me to suffer for him, and send him back unto our father: or if it please thee to retain him for thy slave, I am more fit then he to doe all sorts of services, as you may perceive; and am ready to suffer all that which may be inflicted on me. When Juda had spoken thus, he humbled himself at Josephs feet; indeavouring as much as in him lay, to mollify and appease his ire: in like sort also all the other brothers prostrated themselves, offering themselves to die for Benjamin.

Power given to save.

But Joseph conquered with pitie, and unable any longer to personate a displeased man, sent away all those that were present; and being alone with them, discovered himself unto his brothers; and in this sort to them onely he disclosed himselfe, and said; I cannot but commend the piety and love which you bear unto your brother, which I find to be greater then I did expect, gathering my conjectures from those things which in times past have happened unto me. For, to this end have I done all this, that I might make trial of your brotherly benevolence: whereof since you have given me a notable proofe, I will not ascribe that which you have done unto me, to your natures, but rather wholly to the will of God, who hath at this present furnished you with all things which are profitable for you, and will hereafter give you greater things, if he withdraw not his favourable hand from us. When as therefore I understood of my fathers rather desired then hoped health, and found you to be such as I desired you should be towards your brother, I freely forget those injuries which in times past were done unto me: rather making choice to give you thanks, as the ministers of Gods providence, that against this time provided for our common profit, then remember me (as then it seemed unto me) of your pretended malice. I therefore pray you, that for getting

A getting thoſe things which are paſt, you will be of courage, and wax confident, ſuffering willingly the good event of an ill intent; neither that bluſhing at your former faults, you ſhould be any waies amated. Let not therefore the evil ſentence which in times paſt you pronounced againſt me, any waies trouble you, ſince you perceive it hath wanted effect: but rejoyce ye at theſe works of God, and go and tell your father that which you have ſeen, for feare leſt he being conſumed with immoderate care of you, I my ſelf be deprived of the chiefeſt fruit of my felicitie, before he come to my preſence and be made partaker of thoſe benefits. Wherefore depart you, and bringing with you him, your wives and children, and all your kindred, come back unto me: for it were inconvenient (my dear brethren) that you ſhould not be partakes of my felicitie, eſpecially ſince this famine is as yet to continue for
B the tearm of five years. This ſaid, Joſeph imbraced his brethren: but they were wholly confounded in teares and ſorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had ſinned againſt ſo kind a brother. After all this, their followed a banquet. And the King underſtanding that Joſephs brethren were arrived, (as if ſome good fortune had befallen him) right heartily rejoyced, and he gave them chariots laden with corn, and gold, and ſilver, with other preſents to preſent their father with, who enriched with divers gifts (ſome by their brother unto his father, other ſome to themſelves, but eſpecially to Benjamin) they returned home into their countrey. But after that Jacob underſtood by his ſonnes in what eſtate his ſon Joſeph was, that he had not onely eſcaped from death (which he had ſo long time bewailed) but alſo that he lived in high proſperity, and miniſtred to the King of Egypt, and had weinigh the whole government of the Kingdom under his hands: he eaſilie believed all things
C that were told him, and acknowledged the great works of God, and his goodneſſe ſhewed unto him, although for a time it ſeemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he addreſſed himſelfe to go and viſite his ſonne Joſeph.

CHAP IIII.

How Jacob with all his progeny departed unto his Son,

D BUt when he arrived neere the fountaine of Covenant, he offered in that place a Sacrifice unto God; and fearing leaſt his children ſhould inhabit Egypt by reaſon of the fertilitie of the place, and that his poſteritie by not returning back into the Land of Canaan, ſhould leeſe the poſſeſſion of that which God had promiſed them; and furthermore, doubting leſt that his journey into Egypt being by him enterprized againſt the Will of God ſhould be ominous unto his Children; ſuſpecting likewiſe leſt he ſhould die before he came to Joſephs preſence; he was wonderfullie perplexed in minde. Whileſt thus he ruminated and examined theſe things in his thought, he was ſurpriſed with a heavy ſleep, during which time God appeared unto him and called him twice by his name: who asking who it was that called him, God anſwered: "Doeſt "thou not acknowledge (O Jacob) That God, who hath both protected thee, and thy an- "ceſtors, and ſuccoured you in all your neceſſities? who contrary to thy fathers purpoſe "made thee Lord of his familie, and when as by thy ſelf thou dideſt travell into Meſopo- "tamia, I brought to paſſe, that being matched in wedlock verie happilie, thou returnedſt "into thy countrie back againe, being bleſſed with many children, and ſtored with much "riches. I alſo kept thy progenie in ſafetie, and when it ſeemed thou hadſt loſt Joſeph, I "raiſed him to that high ſtep of dignity wherein now he liveth; and made him the next in "perſon to the King of Egypt. And now alſo I am come unto thee unto this end, that I may "guid thee in thy journie, and that I may foretel thee that thou ſhalt leave thy life be- "twixt the hands of Joſeph, and that thy poſterity ſhall be mighty and famous for many "ages, and ſhall poſſeſs that land, the Empire whereof I have promiſed them. Aſſured and made confident by this dream, he more willingly haſtned, both he, his ſons, with all their progeny into Egypt, whoſe number amounted to the ſumm of 70. Their names, in that they

Now are the reſt to be reckoned up with every one of their progenies. Ruben had foure ſonnes, Anoches, Phalles, Eſſaron, and Charmiſſus. Simeon had ſix, Iumila, Iaminus, Puthodus, Iachenus, Gour, Zaar. Levi alſo had three, Gelſemis, Caathus, and Mararis. Juda had likewiſe three, Sala, Phares, Zara; with two ſons of Phares, Eſrom and Amyrus. Iſſachar had foure, Thulas, Phruras, Iobus, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elon, and Ianel. Lea, who also led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amounteth to 33. But Rachell had two sons, of which the elder was called Joseph, had likewise two, Manasses and Ephraim. But Benjamin had ten, Bolossus, Bacaris, Asabel, Gela, Namans, Ises, Aros, Nomphthis, Optatis, and Sarodus. These fourteene added to those above named, make up the number of fourtie seven. And this was the legitimate issue of Jacob. But on Bala Rachels handmaid Dan and Nepthalim, who was attended by four sons Eleinus, Gunnes, Sares and Hellinus. But Dan had onely one sonne called Vsis. Now if those be added to the above named, they make up the number of 54. But Gad and Asser were born by Zelpha Leas handmaid: of these, Gad was attended by seven sons: Zophonias, Vgis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Erodes and Ariel. Asser had one daughter and six male children whose names were Iomnes, Essus, Iebus, Baris, Abarus, Melmiel. These fifteen being added to the foresaid fifty foure, make up the number abovenamed, together with Jacob. But Joseph understanding that his father was at hand (for Juda posted before to give him notice thereof) he went out to meet him, and incountred him neer to a town called Heros, who was seazed with such extreame and unexpected joy, that he had almost expired; but Ioseph recomforted him, being himselfe almost endangered through extream joy, yet not in such extasie, and extremity as his father; afterwards desiring him to march softly onward, he taking with him his five brethren, hasted unto the king, signifying unto him that his father with all his family were arrived. Who no sooner understood thereof, but that he joyfully asked Ioseph in what studies he took delight: who answered him that his exercise was keeping of cattel, and that he had no other trade. And this answer made he, to the intent they might not be divided one from another, but that living altogether, they might take care of their father: another reason was, lest emulation should happen betwixt them, and the Egyptians, if so be they should be conversant in the same studies; for it was lawful for that nation to exercise the shepheards trade. Now when Iacob was brought into the Kings presence, and after he had done him reverence, and praied God for the prosperity both of him and his Realm; Pharaoh asked him how long he had lived; and when he had understood that he was a hundred and thirty years old, he admired at the age of the man; and after he had certified him that his ancestors had lived far longer time, he commanded him, and his sons to dwell in Heliopolis, where also the Kings Shepheards had their pastures. But the famine increased in Egypt, and the evill augmented more and more, by reason of that Nilus did not overflow the earth; neither extended his arms over the same: on the other side God rained not upon the earth: Moreover in that the evill was unsuspected, it was more grievous especially to the commonaltie, who had laid up nothing, neither did Ioseph give them corn without ready mony: which when they began to want, they exchanged their cattel and slaves for corn; but they that had lands, sold a portion thereof unto the king for their provision. And when as by this meanes all these possessions came into the Kings hands: they went to inhabit the one here, the other there, to the end that the King might be more assured of the possession of their land; the sacrificers onely were excepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained intire. Finally this necessity reduced both the bodies and mindes of the whole Nation into servitude after such a manner, that they esteemed no labour or meanes unseemly, that might serve them towards the maintenance of their sustenance. But when the famine ceased, and the earth watered by the overflow of the flood, began to gather her former fertility; Ioseph visiting every city of the Kingdome, and assembling the multitude in every one of them, restored them the profits of those lands which they had sold unto the King, and exhorted them to manure the same in no worse manner then they would do their own, commanding them to pay the fift part unto the King, which was due unto him by his prerogative and kingly right. Who rejoycing at this unexpected restitution, earnestly intended and and prosecuted their tillage: and by this meanes not onely Iosephs authority, but also the peoples hearts were not a little tied unto the King: and the inheritance of the fift part of the profits remained with the kings that succeeded, and all their posterity.

But Iacob, after he had lived seventeen yeares in Egypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his sonnes, having first besought God to give them prosperity and abundance; and prophesied that every one of their posterity should attaine to the possession of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to passe. Besides, praising his son Ioseph, for that forgetting the injuries done unto him, he had bestowed divers benefits on his brethren, yea, and such as well beseemed his benefactors; he commanded his sonnes, that they should admit Josephs sonns, Ephraim and Manasses into their number, at such time as they should divide the land of Chanaan, as hereafter it shall be declared. Last of all, he prayed them to bury him

And he died at such time as he had lived one hundred and fifty years wanting three, being second to none of his ancestors in piety, and obtained the reward which he ought justly to possesse, in that he was a man adorned with so many vertues. But Joseph by the Kings permission went and transported his fathers body into Hebron, and there buried it very magnificiently. But his Brothers fearing to return with him, and refusing to follow him, in that he suspected their father being dead, that he should be revenged on them in that they had not any friend left alive, under whose favour they might hope for pardon, he commanded them, that laying their suspitions aside, they should suspect no evil: and having brought them back again with him, he gave them great possessions; neither did he ever intermit to entertain them with brotherly kindnesse. But he likewise died, when he had lived one hundreth and ten years; a man endowed with admirable vertue, and prudent in all affairs B and moderate in his government: by which means it came to pass, that neither his forrein birth neither his calamities whereof we have spoken, did any wayes hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignity. The rest of his brothers also, having spent their lives in happinesse, died in Egypt, whose bodies their sonnes and Nephewes transported and buried in Hebron: but Josephs bones were afterwards translated by the Hebrewes into Chanaan, at such time as they departed out of Egypt into Chanaan; for hereunto had he bound them by an Oath. CHAP. V.

C Of the affliction which the Hebrewes endured in Egypt, for the space of four hundred yeares. Exod. 1.

THe Egyptians are a nation addicted unto delicacy, and impatient of labour, subject onely to their pleasures, and affecting gain: whence it came to passe, that bearing hatred towards the Hebrewes, and envying their happinesse, they were very evilly disposed toward them. For seeing the race of the Israelites flourish and to abound in riches, which they got by their labour and industry, they conceived an opinion that their advancement and increase, would be the overthrow and de- D crease of the Egyptians; so that at length they forgot the benefits which Joseph had done unto them: and after the royalty was transported into another family, they committed divers outrages against the Israelites, and complotted against them in what manner they might more grievously afflict them. For they were enjoyned by them to cut Nilus into divers trenches, and to inviron their City with walls, and to build fortifications and banks, whereby the inundations of the Flood might be diverted. They also vexed our nation in building their high and vain Pyramides, compelling them to learn divers arts, and to accustome themselves to endure labour; and in such afflictions led they their lives for the space of 400. years, the Egyptians studying nought else but to tire the Israelites with conti- E nual labour, and our countrey-men endeavouring themselves alwaies to perform far more then was expected from them. Living thus in this estate, there grew afterwards another occasion, which instigated them the more to seek the ruine and desolation of our Nation. For one of the sacred secretaries (to whose predictions those kind of people do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there should be one bred and born among the Israelites, that in time to come should grievously inflict the estate of the Egyptians, and wonderously enhance the good hap of the Israelites; who should surpasse all other in vertue, and purchase to himself immortal glory, if so be he should attain to mans estate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, he published an Edict by the advice of this secretary, that whatsoever male-child should be born among the Israelites he should be cast into the flood to be drowned: he commanded likewise the Egyptian midwives diligently to observe F the time when the Hebrew women travelled with child, carefully to keep and mark their children at such time as they were delivered. For it was enjoyned them that they should be brought to bed by such Midwives, who by reason of consanguinity with that nation, should not transgresse the Kings Comandement; he enacted also a law with a penalty, that if any should be so bold to conceal their Parents, both they and all their family should be done to death. Great was their calamity. not onely in that respect, because they were deprived of their children, and for that the children themselves were made the ministers to murther their own children; but foreseeing also the future time, they were intollerably dismayed, expecting nought else but the certain and fatal extirpation of their whole nation, by rea-

Amarames (Moses father prayeth God to be merciful to the Hebrewes. he made his recourse unto God, beseeching him that at the length he would have mercy on those men by whom onely he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would please H him to bring to end the present affliction which threatned the whole nation with utter ruine and destruction. But God being moved unto mercy by his most humble prayer, appeared to him in a dream, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the piety of his ancestors, and that he would for ever remunerate them, even as in times past he had been gracious to their Forefathers. For it was he that had increased their posterity, and multiplied them to so mighty a nation, that by his favour A- brahams departing alone out of Mesopotamia into Chanaan, besides other felicities, had issue by his wife that was beforetime barren, and left ample possessions to his successors: to Ismael, Arabia, to Chaturas children Troglottida, and to Isaac Chanaan. Neither can you ever forget without note of impiety and ingratitude, the attempts also which were happily atchie-ved in warre by my meanes: but Jacobs name is also renowned amongst forrain nations, both in respect of the felicity wherein he lived, and also for that prosperity which by hereditary I right hapned unto his posterity, who taking their original from 70. men that accompanied their father into Egypt, now increased to the number of six hundred thousand: know therefore now also, that I inwardly and heartily affect your publick security, and privately thy glory. For this child, for fear of whose nativity, the Egyptians have condemned all your children unto death, shall be born unto thee: he neither shall be discovered by the constituted spies, and after he hath escaped beyond all expectation, shall he be brought up, and in his time shall he deliver the Hebrews from the thraldome of the Egyptians. And shall obtain an eternal memory, for this his famous action, not onely amongst his own nation, but also amongst strangers; for this favour will I exten unto thee, and on thy posterity that followeth after thee; he shall also have such a brother, w[illegible] deserve both in himself, and in his posterity to inherit the Priesthood for ever. After these things were declared in a vi- K sion unto Amram, he awaked and told it to his wife Jochabel, and by reason of the prediction of this dream, their suspition and fear the rather increased more and more: for they were Ex d. 2.1,2,3, ad. 10. Moses birth. not onely pensive in respect of their child; but also by reason of the future great good fortune that was promised them. But anon after the woman being brought to bed, gave credit to the Oracle, who had so easie and gentle a labour, that she beguiled the overseers and spies, in that she felt none of those throes which do commonly afflict such as are in labour: so that she nourished the infant three moneths secretly in her house, without being in any sort discovered. But afterwards Amram fearing to be surprized, and sore doubting lest he should incurre the kings displeasure, if the matter were discovered, whereby both he, and the child should L be made away, and Gods promises should be frustrate; he had rather wholly commit the safety of his son to his providence: supposing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithstanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troublesome unto him to live in continual peril both of his own and his sons safety: moreover, he thought that God would purvey some means of assurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be proved false. Grounding himself on this resolution, they prepared and made a cradle of sedge, after the manner of a couch, so great as it was sufficient to lay the child in at ease, and having pitched it on every side lest the water should pierce the same, they put the child into it, and suffering him to float along the stream, in committing him to the mercy of God. M 2.3. Moses cast into the flood. Whilest in this manner it was born down by the stream; Mariam, the sister of the young infant, by her mothers command went along the bank on the other side of the river, observing whither at length the basket would be carried, and where it did arrive. At that time God manifestly declared, that nothing is atchieved by mans wisedome, but that all things are brought to passe by his Omnipotent bounty, and that they, who for their profit and particular security seek the ruine and destruction of others with never so much subtilty, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceived in their expectations: Again,

A that they that ſubmit their wills unto Gods will, are warranted from all wrongs by ſuch means as were never thought on, which may moſt manifeſtly be perceived by this child.

Thermuthis the kings daughter walking along the river ſide, eſpied this basket carried away by the courſe of the ſtream, and preſently commanded certain ſwimmers to draw the cradle on drie land, and bring it before her: who executing her command, ſhe opened the basket and beheld the child; who in that he was fair and well featured did greatly delight her. For God ſo loved and favoured Moſes, that he cauſed him both to be nouriſhed and brought up by them, who for fear leſt he ſhould be born, had decreed to deſtroy all the reſt of the race of the Hebrews. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her ſome one nurſe who might give the child ſuck: Who refuſing the ſame, and all other nurſes whatſoe-
B ver they were ſent for to ſuckle him; Mariam as if by good fortune, and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had light into their company, began to ſpeak thus unto Thermuthis: In vain (ſaid ſhe) O Queen, doeſt thou endeavour, whilſt thou ſtriveſt to give this babe ſuck by any but an Hebrew nurſe, for he will not except it: for if thou call unto thee a nurſe of the ſame nation, and agreeable with this nature, doubtleſſe he will take the nipple. This ſpeech of hers being both heard, and plauſibly accepted, the Queen commanded her to execute the ſame, and to being her an Hebrew woman that gave ſuck; which ſhe diligently performing, returned, and brought her mother with her, whom none of the aſſiſtants knew; who preſenting her breaſt unto the child, he willingly took the dugge: ſo, that upon the Queens requeſt, the nouriſh-
C ment of the child was wholly committed unto her. And by reaſon of this accident, and for that he was caſt into the river, he was called Moſes; for the Egyptians call water, Mo; and ſaved, Yſes: ſo this name, compoſed of theſe two, was impoſed on this child; who afterwards without exceptions became the wiſeſt man among the Hebrews, according as God had afore prophecied. For he was the ſeventh after Abraham: for he was Amrams ſonne, and Amram ſonne unto Cathus, and he to Levi and Levi to Jacob; who took the original from Iſaac, the ſon of Abraham. He had a judgment riper then became his age: for even amongſt his childiſh delights, he ſhewed himſelf more diſcreet then all his equalls; and in whatſoever he did, it gave teſtimony, that at ſuch time as he ſhould attain to mans eſtate, he would manage mighty things. When he was but onely three years old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable audacity. He was ſo fair and amiable, that there was not any one, D how auſtere and inhumane ſoever he were, which but in beholding him, would not be aſtoniſhed. And it chanced alſo, that divers, who encountred him as he was born thorow the ſtreets, turned themſelves about to behold him, and intermitted their other affairs, onely to look upon him: for the admirable and innated beauty which was in this infant did raviſh all thoſe that beheld him. Whence it came to paſſe, that Thermuthis, in that ſhe had no other iſſue, adopted him for her heir; and conducting him unto her father, ſhe preſented him before him, ſaying that ſhe was careful of a ſucceſſour, by reaſon God had not vouchſafed him to have any iſſue, for (ſaith ſhe) I have brought up this Infant, no leſſe excellent in wit then divine in beauty, and have received him miraculouſly, by the bounty and grace of Nilus, whom I have decreed to adopt my child, and to eſtabliſh him as ſucceſſour to thee in thy
E kingdom. This ſaid, ſhe delivered the infant into her fathers arms: who, after he had imbraced and hugged him at his breaſt (to give his daughter the more content) he put his diadem upon the childs head: but Moſes pulling it from his head after a childiſh manner, caſt it on the ground, and ſpurned it with his feet; which act of his was ſuppoſed ominous to the realm, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the ſacred Secretary (who had fore-told, that his nativity would be the deſtruction of the Egyptians) willed them to kill the child, and enforced himſelf to enact it, crying out with a loud voice, and ſpeaking unto the King after this manner: O king, this child, by whoſe death God promiſeth us ſecurity, hath already confirmed the preſage, inſulting over thy Kingdome, and ſpurning at thy diadem: Take from the Egyptians that fear which they have conceived through him, by his death; and from the Hebrewes that hope which they build on his courage and life. But Thermuthis ha-
F ſtily conveyed and ſnatched him thence, and the king was not over-forward to lay hands on him, by reaſon that God diſpenſed all things in that ſort, in that he had a care of Moſes preſervation. He was therefore very carefully brought up: and in reſpect of him, the Hebrews in general were repleniſhed with good hope; but to the Egyptians, his education both was ſuſpected and grudged at: but by reaſon that if the lad ſhould have been ſlain, there was not any one, either a kinne, or adopted, or otherwiſe whatſoever, that had regard of the eſtate of the Egyptians, they abſtained from his ſlaughter. Being therefore thus born, and after this manner brought up; at ſuch time as he increaſed in years, he evidently, by his vertue, vertue, made it known unto the Egyptians, that he was born to abaſe their pride, and to exalt the Hebrews, by this occaſion which enſueth. The Ethiopians, who confine upon Egypt, having ſpoiled and deſtroyed the Country round about them, ſpoiled and made pillage of all the goods of the Egyptians; who, incenſed againſt them for the wrongs and injuries which they had offered, levied an army, intending to revenge them of that diſgrace which their enemies had offered them: but in the battel they were all put to flight, ſo that ſome of them were ſlain: and the reſt ſhamefully flying, returned with ignominy worſe then death, into their own countrey. The Ethiopians made proud with this good fortune, inſtantly purſued them: and ſuppoſing it a cowardly part in them, no to take the benefit of their preſent good fortune, and conceiving an aſſured hope of conquering Egypt, they generally waſted the ſame: and having taſted of the ſweetneſſe of pillage, without any temper of moderation in their victory, they were incenſed to attempt greater matters. And whereas they perceived, that having waſted all their neighbour regions, no man durſt ſally out, to encounter them in armes, they marched forward toward Memphis, even unto the ſea; arriving near no City that either had the heart, or durſt make head againſt them. By which calamities, the Egyptians being over-ſore oppreſſed, they ſend one to ask counſel of the oracle, in what manner they might prevent their miſeries; and when as an anſwer was given them, That they ſhould chuſe an Hebrew to aſſiſt them in the warres, the king commanded his daughter to give them Moſes; who, together with the Empire, might govern the whole army. She taking an oath of the king, that no injury or violence ſhould be offered him, delivered him into his hands; eſteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moſes, that he was called to the ſuccours of her countrey: and contrariwiſe, ſhe blamed the ſacrificers, who were not aſhamed to demand his aid and aſſiſtance, whom they had fore-judged, and adjudged to be ſlain as their common enemy. But Moſes exhorted by Thermuthis and the king, willingly took the charge upon him. Whereat the Prieſts of both nations were very joyful: for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had overcome their enemies, they afterwards might more eaſily diſpatch and murther him, by ſome treaſon and liniſter meanes; and the Hebrews conceived an hope, that they might depart out of Egypt, by reaſon that Moſes was the Generall of the army. Moſes therefore making haſte; before ſuch time as the enemies had any notice that he was diſlodged, he levied his army, and conducted them, not along the banks of the river, but thorow the main land; wherein he made manifeſt his moſt admirable prudence. For the journey by land being very dangerous, by reaſon of the multitude of ſerpents, (for the Countrey thereabouts breedeth up all ſorts of them, and ſome of that kind, as the like thereof are not ſeen in any place elſe, all different in propriety, malignity, and horrible form, and amongſt theſe likewiſe there are ſome winged, and apt to flie, who not onely offend thoſe that they encounter on the earth very privily, but alſo towre very high in the air, who hover about to hurt thoſe that are not aware of them) he for the ſecurity of his army, and to the end he might march without any inconvenience, invented this marvellous and admirable ſtratagem: For he cauſed two paniers of ſedge to be made, in form of cofers, and filled them with certain birds which were called Ibes, who are mortal enemies to ſerpents, and before whom the ſerpents flee; and ſometimes, in flying from them like harts, they are laid hold of, and ſwallowed by them. Otherwiſe theſe birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmfull to any but to ſerpents: of whom I will now ceaſe to write any further, becauſe the Greeks do already know what kind of bird it is.

When as therefore he arrived in the countrey of ſerpents, he let flie his Ibes againſt the venemous beaſts, and made uſe of them to encounter the other. And when he had marched in this ſort, he attained and ſurpriſed the Ethiopians, before they ſuſpected him; and ſuddenly charging them, he overcame them in battel, ſpoiling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt: and entring the towns of Ethiopia, he raiſed them, and made a great ſlaughter of the inhabitants. The Egyptian army having taſted the happy ſucceſſe that happened unto them under the conduct of Moſes, intermitted not their occaſion; eſpecially, for that they ſaw that the Ethiopians were wel-nigh conquered, or rather wholly deſtroyed: and in the end having driven them even unto Saba the chief city of Ethiopia, (which Cambyſes called Meroe, for the love which he bore unto his ſiſter, who was ſo called) they beſieged them. The city was ſtrong, and very hard to be aſſailed, by reaſon of the river Nilus, which environed it round about: on the other ſide, the rivers of Aſtapus and Aſtaborra did flow in ſo freſhly, as they could neither break the courſe of the water, nor wade over the ſtream: for the city is builded in an Iſland, environed with a ſtrong wall round about; having great

A great rampiers betwixt the rivers and the wals built, to reſiſt the inundations of the waters: which are the cauſe that the city may be very hardly taken, although the oppoſite army had found means to paſſe the water. Now, when Moſes was very ſore grieved that his army profited nothing, by reaſon that the enemy durſt not encounter them in open field: behold what a chance happened: Tharbis, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, beholding Moſes at ſuch time as he approached with his army neer unto the wals of the city, and ſeeing how valiantly he fought and behaved himſelf, and wondring at the exploits and enterpriſes which he made, (which was the cauſe that the Egyptians, almoſt deſpairing of their eſtates and liberty, were grown ſo forward) and how the Ethiopians, not long before eſteemed the conquerors, and happy in their warlike exploits & fortunate executions, were in the greateſt extremity of danger) ſhe was ſurprized with his love: and for that this paſſion augmented
B more and more in her, ſhe ſent unto him ſeven of her moſt faithful and houſhould ſervants, to offer him her love, and entreat with him of marriage. The which he accepted, under that condition, that ſhe ſhould deliver the city into his hands; promiſing her, under a ſolemne oath, That at ſuch time as he were maſter thereof, he would take her to wife, without falſifying or breach of his promiſe. The matter was no ſooner motioned, but the effect followed. So, that having ſurpriſed and conquered the Ethiopians, and after he had given thanks unto God, Moſes accompliſhed the marriage, and ſent the Egyptians back again into their countrey. Who conceived an occaſion of hatred againſt Moſes, becauſe he had been the cauſe of their ſafety; and began ſeriouſly to conſult and deviſe amongſt themſelves, how they might betray him; ſuſpecting leſt he, by reaſon of the happy ſucceſſe he had had,
C ſhould begin to quicken and revive ſome alterations in Egypt. They accuſed him therefore of murther before the king, who already of himſelf had him in ſuſpition, as well in reſpect of the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, during ſuch time as he was General, as alſo for the fear he had conceived of the deſtruction of Egypt, foretold by his Prieſts, who inceſſantly incited him againſt Moſes: ſo that the king was upon the point to lay hands on him, and murther him.

But he having intelligence of thoſe his practiſes, eſcaped and fled ſecretly, flying from his preſence thorow the Deſart, by which the enemies leaſt ſuſpected that he ſhould have fled; and although at no place in his journey he found victuals to ſuſtain him, yet overcame
D he his penurie by his patience. And arriving neer a city of the Madians ſcituate upon the ſhore of the Red-Sea, that was named by one of Abraham, and Chetura's ſonnes) he ſat him down near unto a fountain, refreſhing himſelf, and taking his eaſe, after his laborious journey; for it was about noon-ſtead, and the citie already appeared in his ſight. In this place there befel an occaſion unto him, derived from the manners and cuſtome of living among the inhabitants of the countrey; by which he both expreſſed his virtue and found an opportunity to better his eſtate. For whereas the region is ſore travelled with want of water, the ſhepheards had a cuſtome, to ſtrive which of them ſhould firſt poſſeſſe the pits, for feare leſt the water ſhould be quite conſumed by others, before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirſt. To this fountaine therefore there came ſeven virgins, which were
E ſiſters and daughters of Raguel the Prieſt, whom the inhabitants of that place held in great eſtimation, who had the charge to attend their fathers flocks; for that it is the exerciſe wherein the Troglodites are wont to exerciſe their women. Theſe haſted themſelves to draw ſufficient water for their troops into the troughs, expreſly made to receive the water; and when in the mean time the ſhepheards came and ſurprized them, and drove away the virgins, to the end they might be maſters of the water: Moſes ſuppoſing it a matter unworthy his honour to ſuffer this outrage, and to endure, that by violence men ſhould deprive virgins of their right and intereſt; he drove away the ſhepheards, who would have enjoyed that which appartained not unto them, and gave neceſſary ſuccours unto the diſmaied maidens. Who as ſoon as they were returned into their fathers preſence; told him the outrage
F that was done them by the ſhepheards, and the ſuccours that they found by the hands of a ſtranger; beſeeching him that the courteſie which he had ſhewen unto them ſhould not be forgotten, but that in ſome ſort he might receive recompence. The father commending his daughters thankfulneſſe towards their benefactor, commanded them to bring Moſes into his preſence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deſerved. As ſoon as he came into his preſence, Raguell told him, how his daughters had given him to underſtand, how kindly he had aſſiſted them: and having his vertue in admiration, he ſaid, that he had not adventured himſelf, nor done kindneſſe to thoſe that were without ſenſe of the courteſies that were ſhewed unto them, but unto thoſe who were capable to give him thanks;

thanks; yea, ſo ready to requite him, that the greatneſſe of their requital ſhould far ſurpaſſe the meaſure of his humanitie. He therefore adopted him for his ſon, and gave him one of his daughters to wife, and made him ſuperintendent and maſter of the flocks (in which, in times paſt, the wealth and riches of forrain nations conſiſted.) Moſes having obtained this good fortune at Ietheglæus hands (for ſuch was Raguels ſurname) he abode there with him, and attended his flocks. But not long after he led his cattel to graze neer to the mountaine Sinai, which is the higheſt of all thoſe that are in that quarter, and good for paſturage, by reaſon of the wholſome herbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithſtanding was not fed upon before that time, becauſe the ſhepheards durſt not frequent thereabouts, by reaſon of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey: who ſaid, that God inhabited that mountain. There happened there unto him a marvellous prodegie, which was, that a flame of fire ſeemed round about him in a buſh, without offenſing either the green herbs, or the flowers, or the boughs charged without fruit, althogh the flame were great and vehement. He not a little amazed at this unexpected ſpectacle, at laſt grew more and more amazed, when as he heard a voice iſſuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accuſing him of boldneſſe, in that he was not affraid to tread upon that ground, which hitherto was unacceſſible, and religiouſly reverenced, and unhaunted by men; counſelling him, that he ſhould depart a far off from the flame, and content himſelf with that viſion; for although that he were a virtuous man, and deſcended from great perſonages, yet that he ought not to be curious, to make further ſearch into the ſame. The ſame voice alſo told him, That the honour and glory which he obtained amongſt men, was by the aſſiſtance of God: charging him to be of a good courage, and to repair into Egypt, for that in that place he ſhould be captain and guide of the Hebrew nation, and ſhould deliver that people which were therein, from the outrage and ſervitude which they ſuffered. For (ſaid the Voice) they ſhall inhabit this happie countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they ſhall enjoy all ſorts of bleſſings, under the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover it commanded him, That having brought the Hebrewes out of Egypt, he ſhould offer ſacrifice of thanksgiving, at ſuch time as he ſhould arrive again in that place. And ſuch was the oracle which he received from out of the flame. Moſes altogether raviſhed at that which he had both heard and ſeen, ſpake thus; O Lord, it were madneſſe in me, and no prudence, if I ſhould diſtruſt thy power, the which I reverence, and which as I know hath been manifeſted unto my predeceſſors; notwithſtanding, I ſtand in doubt, how I, who am a man of no eloquence, and of leſſe force, ſhould perſwade my brethren, by my words, to forſake the countrey wherein they inhabit, to follow me into that countrey whither I will conduct them. And although they ſhould be perſwaded to do the ſame, how can I force Pharaoh to permit them to depart from thence, by whoſe labours and travels the Egyptians are daily encreaſed in goods and riches? Whereupon God gave him to underſtand, that he ſhould take upon him a good courage, and promiſed him, that he himſelf would aſiſt him: and that if he had need of eloquence, he would beſtow upon him the facultie of perſwaſion; or if he were driven to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding, that in confirmation of thoſe promiſes he had made him, he ſhould let fall his ſtaffe upon the ground: which having done a dragon began to creep upon the ground, and in turning and rowling himſelf, lifted up his creſt on high; making ſemblance, to defend himſelf againſt thoſe that ſhould aſſail him; and again, a little whiles after, became a ſtaffe again. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his boſome; and no ſooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, and in colour reſembling chalk: and a little while after, it recovered his ordinary form. Moreover, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Well, and to pour it on the ground, and he ſaw it turned into a bloody colour. Amazed at theſe accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and aſſured, that he ſhould have great aſſiſtance. Moreover, that he ſhould uſe theſe ſigns before all men, to the end, (ſaith God) that all may believe, that being ſent by me, thou doſt all this according to my commandement. Furthermore I enjoyne thee, That without any further delay, thou haſte thee into Egypt; and that thou travel day and night, without leeſing time, without delaying any more to ſuccour the poor Hebrewes, grieviouſlie afflicted in Egypt. Moſes having no cauſe to diſtruſt that which God had promiſed him, and being confirmed by theſe things, whereof he was both an eye-witneſſe, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occaſion to expreſſe the like power in Egypt, he would vouchſafe to further the effect: beſeeching him further, that he would not conceal his Name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voice, and the ſight of his preſence: that it might pleaſe him therefore to declare unto him his Name, to

A the end, that when he ſhould offer ſacrifice unto him, he might call upon the ſame. God declared unto him his Name, which beforetime had been concealed amongſt men; and of which alſo it is not lawful for me to ſpeak. Moſes wrought theſe ſignes not onely at that time, but alſo when or whereſoever he thought it requiſite: by all which he gave further credit to the fire which had appeared unto him, and aſſured himſelf, that God would be his favourable defender, that he would deliver his brethren; and intangle and enwrap the Egyptians in great calamities. And after that he had underſtood, that Pharaoh King of Egypt was dead (during whoſe life, he fled from thence) he requeſted Raguel, that he would give him leave to depart into Egypt, for the profit of thoſe of his nation; and taking with him Sephora, (who was Raguels daughter, and his married wife) and Gerſon and Eleazar, his children, B which he had by her, he departed to go into Egypt. Now this name of Gerſon, in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth forrain: and Eleazar ſignifieth, favoured by God; in memory, that Moſes had eſcaped from amongſt the Egyptians by the aſſiſtance of the God of his fathers. and as he approached near the mountains, Aaron, his brother, by the commandement of God, came forth to meet him; to whom he declared all that which had hapned unto him in the mountain, and that which God had given him in charge. And as they paſſed onward of their way, the men of greateſt eſtimation among the Hebrewes (having intelligence of his coming) came out to meet him; to whom Moſes preſented the above-named tokens, by reaſon that he could not perſwade them by words: and they being aſtoniſhed at that which they had ſeen him do beyond their expectation, waxed confident, and conceived a good hope of all things, ſeeing that God had a care of their ſafety. When he perceived that the C Hebrewes were ready to obey him, and that they proteſted to follow him in all that which he ſhould command them, through the earneſt deſire they had to be at liberty; he preſented himſelf before the king, who had newly undertaken the Government, and ſhewed him the great benefits he had done unto the Egyptians, at ſuch time as they were deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, who had ſpoiled all their countrey; and how he had ſpared no travel, but ſuſtained all the charge of the warre, as if it had been waged for his own proper nation. On the other ſide, he opened unto him the dangers which he had injuſtly ſuffered for his recompence. He afterwards diſcourſed unto him that which had befallen him near unto the fountain of Sinai, and the talk which God had in that place with him; and the ſignes in particular which had been ſhewed unto him, in confirmation of thoſe things whereunto he was D enjoyned; exhorting the King, not to miſtruſt or impeach the ordinance of God. The King hearing this, began to mock him: but Moſes made him ſee in effect, the ſignes which were ſhewed unto him near the mountain of Sinai. But the King waxed wroth, and grievouſly reviled him; accuſing him, for that in times paſt he fled away, for fear to be ſlain in Egypt, and at this preſent returned thither, under a ſubtile pretext, cloking his craft with magick, and inchantment, the more to affright him. And at the ſame inſtant he called into his preſence the Prieſts of Egypt, to let them ſee thoſe ſignes, and to make it manifeſt, that the Egyptians were exerciſed in thoſe ſciences; and that he onely was not maſter in thoſe things, the wich he boaſted to perform by Gods power, but that they were but deceits and ſhadowes of marvels, to deceive the multitude. Whereupon the Prieſts caſt down their rods, and they became ſerpents. Moſes being nothing moved herewith, ſaid: O King, I deſpiſe not E the wiſedome of the Egyptians; but I proteſt, that, that which I have done, doth ſo farre ſurpaſſe all their Magick and art, as there is difference between divine and humane things. I will therefore ſhew you, that, that which I do, is not by inchantment, nor under colour of apparant verity, but by the providence and power of God. This ſaid, he caſt his rod upon the ground, commanding it to change it ſelf into a ſerpent: whereunto it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it devoured all the rods of the Egyptians, which ſeemed to be ſerpents, untill they were all of them conſumed; and that done, Moſes took his ſtaffe into his hand again, and it reaſſumed his priſtine form, but the King being never the more aſtoniſhed, (but the rather incenſed at that which was done) ſaid, that this wiſedome and ſubtilty F of Moſes ſhould profit him nothing,, which he uſed in diſgrace of the Egyptians. He commanded therefore the overſeer of the works, who had the Government of the Hebrews, that he ſhould remit nothing of their labour, but that he ſhould oppreſſe them with more tedious and grievous tasks then they were wont to be put unto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them ſtraw, to make their tyle with) he forbare, after that time, to give them that allowance; and taxing them in the day time to follow their work, he appointed them by night to find and bring their ſtraw; doubling thereby the weight of their former labour. Notwithſtanding all this, Moſes would neither deſiſt from his purpoſe, in regard of the kings threatning threatning, nor the continual cry of his countreymen, neither was in any sort appalled thereat; but with a confident and unappalled mind (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to restore his countreymen to their desired liberty. He therefore once again accosted the king, perswading him to dismisse the Hebrewes, to the end they might repair unto the mount Sinai, and sacrifice unto God in that place: for no lesse (saith he) hath he commanded, neither can any resist his will. For which cause, he advised the king to endeavour himself (lest he should seem to contemne his favours) to grant the people free passage; for fear, lest if he should secretly forbid them the same, he might accuse and condemne himself to suffer that, which they in reason ought to endure, who resist the will and works of God. For to those that stirre up the wrath of God against themselves, all kinde of mishaps do flock and flow on every side: The earth befriendeth them not, neither smileth the air upon them; their children are not begotten according to nature; but all things oppose themselves as enemies and contraries against them. Moreover he added, that the Egyptians should feel the plague, after that the people of the Hebrewes should (in despight of their resistance) depart out of their countrey. But in that the king despised these words of Moses, and would not be converted, most grievious plagues fell upon the land of Ægypt, The which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Ægyptians suffered those things, which never before that time happened to any other people; and for that cause likewise, that I may testifie and declare, that Moses hath not falsified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and besides, for that it is expedient for men to learn and do those things which are agreeable to Gods will, for fear lest he being provoked and incensed against them, should punish them for their injustice.) For first of all, by the commandement of God, the river overflowed with blood, neither was it impossible for them to drink, (notwithstanding they had no other fountain of water) neither was the water onely coloured like blood, but when as likewise any one drank thereof, it ingendred and procured in him divers dolours, and grievous gripings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrewes it seemed good and sweet in taste, without any waies changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the king (not knowing what to do, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid, by reason of the Ægyptians) permitted the Hebrewes to depart. But no sooner was this plague ceased, but he presently changed his mind, and would not permit them liberty to depart. For which cause, God (seeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned notwithstanding he had delivered him from the former calamity) he inflicted another plague upon the Ægyptians, He therefore sent an infinite number of frogs upon them, that covered and infected the whole countrey; and the rivers were so packed and stored with them in such manner, that they that drew water to drink, found it altogether infected with the putrifaction of them, dying and rotting in the waters: so that the whole countrey was full of filthy mud, by reason of the frogs that defaced and died on the same. They corrupted also their meats, mingling themselves in their houses amidst their meat and drink, and creeping amidst their chambers; from whence an odious stench exhaled, by reason of the multitude of frogs that lay dead. Now when the Ægyptians saw themselves so sore pressed with these evils, the King commanded Moses, that he should take the Hebrewes, and that he should depart. And as soon as he had spoken this, the multitude of frogs vanished, and appeared no more, neither on the earth, nor in the water, but that they retained their accustomed nature. No sooner was the earth delivered from this curse, but Pharaoh forgot the cause thereof, and retained the Hebrewes anew: and (as if he had a desire to experiment the manners of divers miseries) he denied them that issue which before time he had granted them: rather inforced thereunto by his fear, then forward good liking. For this cause, God once again rewarded his fraud, by sending him another plague: for a multitude of lice swarmed from the bodies of the Egyptians, whence the wretched men perished wretchedly; neither could they exterminate that race, either by bathings or inunctions. The king troubled with this calamity and fearing the ruin of his people, and bethinking him of the shameful end thereof (he was constrained to remit the better part of his malignity. For as touching the Hebrewes, he permitted them to depart; but (after the plague was appeased) he required at their hands, that they would leave their wives and children behind them for pledges, till they return: and by this meanes he provoked Gods wrath more heavily against him, in that he supposed to delude his providence: as if it had not been God, who (in the Hebrewes behalf) had punished them, but Moses, that had plagued the Egyptians. For God filled their countrey with many and divers sorts of beasts, (the like whereof, before that time, had not been seen in that countrey) which killed them up, so that the earth became desolate and unmanured; and

But notwithſtanding all theſe, the King ſtill continued obſtinate in his wickedneſſe, and diſobedient unto God; permitting onely, that the women and men ſhould depart, and that there children ſhould be left behind them: but God deſiſted not to puniſh his wickedneſſe by divers and moſt grievous plagues, far more tedious then the former, yea, ſuch as were diſperſed over all the people. The year of the world, 2454. before the nativity of Christ, 1510.

For their bodies were grievouſly tormented with ulcers, and corrupted inwardly: and after this ſort, the greater part of the Egyptians periſhed. But when as the king was neither moderated nor mollified by this plague, God rained down hail upon them, (which never before that time was engendred in the aire of Egypt; and further ſo great, or rather greater then that, which falleth to the Northward, neer to the Pole Artique, in the midſt B of the Spring) and ſpoiled all their fruit. After which, an army of graſhopers devoured all thoſe buds and fruits which were unoffenced by the hail; ſo that all the hope which the Egyptians had or their harveſt uf fruit, was utterly overthrown. Theſe aforeſaid afflictions had been ſufficient to perſwade a man of the meaneſt wit (except he had been a reprobate) to grow wiſe, and make uſe of that which was moſt profitable for him. But Pharaoh knowing the cauſes of the ſame, enforced himſelf to reſiſt God, not onely through imprudence, but for malice; ſo that voluntarily he betraied his common-weale. He therefore commanded Moſes, that he ſhould lead away the Hebrews with their wives; but that they ſhould leave their ſubſtance behind them for a prey; in that they complained, that after all theſe calamities they had nothing left them. To whom Moſes anſwered, that he demanded an unlawfull matter, by reaſon that they were to offer ſacrifice unto God of their prey, or bootie.

C Now while the time was ſpent in theſe conſultations, darkneſſe altogether devoid of light over-ſpread the land of Egypt, where through they died miſerably in cloſing their eyes, by reaſon of the thickneſſe thereof, ſo that they were afraid leſt the fogge ſhould choak them; which being diſperſed, after three daies, and ſo many nights; Moſes ſeeing that Pharaoh would not repent nor let the people of Iſrael depart, he came unto him, and ſpake after this manner: As long as you ſhall reſiſt the Ordinance of God (who commandeth you to ſuffer the Hebrews to depart) there is no means, whereby you may be exempted from theſe miſchiefs in doing that which you do. The king enraged at theſe words, threatned him to cut off his head, if once more he durſt appear in his preſence, to motion unto him any D ſuch matter. Moſes anſwered him that he would no more ſpeak unto him as touching this matter; but that both himſelf, and the chiefeſt among the Egyptians would exhort the Hebrews to depart: which ſaid, he forſook his preſence. But God intending to expreſſe that he meant yet once more to plague the Egyptians, and to conſtrain them to deliver the Hebrews, he commanded Moſes to declare unto the people, that they ſhould have their ſacrifice in a readineſſe, and having prepared it the thirteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, to celebrate the ſame the fourteenth of the ſaid moneth (by the Egyptians called Pharmuth; and by the Hebrews Niſan, and Zanthicus by the Macedonians) and that he ſhould lead forth all the Hebrews, bearing with them all their goods. Whereupon he who had E the Hebrews alreadie in a readineſſe to depart, and had diſtributed them by families, kept them in one place, and in the ſame order: but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (addreſſed to depart) made ſacrifice, and with the blood of the Lamb purged their houſes, beſprinkling them with branches of Hyſſop. And after they had ſupped, they burned the fleſh that remained, as being on the point to addreſſe themſelves to depart. Whereupon even at this day we retain the ſaid cuſtome to ſacrifice in like ſort: and do call this ſolemnity Paſcha, which is as much to ſay, the paſſage; by reaſon that on that day God leaving and overpaſſing the Hebrews without harm, ſtrok the Egyptians with ſickneſſe: for that plague in the night time cut off all the firſt begotten in Egypt, ſo that by multitudes they that dwelt round about the Palace aſſembled them in the preſence of the king; and beſought him to let the Hebrews go: for which cauſe Pharaoh calling Moſes, gave F order that they ſhould depart the countrey, ſuppoſing that as ſoon as they were gone, Egypt ſhould be no more afflicted with ſuch like plagues. Moreover they honoured the Hebrews with preſents, partly to the end they ſhould depart with the more expedition, partlie for the neighbourhood and acquaintance ſake, which they had one with another. And as they departed, the Egyptians ſayd, and repented them of the evill uſage they had ſhewed unto them: but they took their way towards Latopolis at that time deſart, and in which place afterwards Babylon was builded, at ſuch time as Cambyſes deſtroyed Egypt. The third day they came unto Beelzephon neer unto the Red Sea, and for that they wanted victuals, by reaſon of the deſart, they tempered their meal with water, and hardned it with a little G heat, and made cakes, with which they ſuſtained themſelves for the ſpace of thirty daies: for they had not brought any more victual out of Egypt, but as much as would ſerve them for that time, and that which they had, they diſpenſed very ſparingly, rather feeding for neceſſity, then eating with ſafety. The Hebrews depart out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moſes.

The yeer of the world, 2454. before the nativity of Chriſt, 1510.

THey therefore forſook Egypt the fourteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, foure hundreth and thirtie yeares after Abraham our father came into Canaan, and in the two hundreth and fifteenth year after Jacob was tranſported into Egypt the eighttenth year of Moſes age; who had Aaron to his Brother, three years elder then himſelf, They carried alſo with them the bones of Joſeph, according as he had commanded his ſons. But the Egyptians repented themſelves becauſe they had ſuffered the Hebrews to depart: the King alſo was very ſore moved; ſuppoſing, that I which was fallen upon them, had happened by Moſes meanes, and they all concluded to purſue and follow after them. They therefore armed themſelves, and furniſhed them with all their abiliments of warre, intending to purſue them, under intent to bring them back, if they might overtake them: for they ſaid, that God would no more be diſpleaſed againſt them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewiſe verie eaſily to bring them under ſubjection, becauſe they were all of them diſarmed, and wearied with travell. They therefore enquired of everie one which way they held, and haſted themſelves to follow them, although they knew the region was very hard to travell in; not onely for thoſe that were to march in troop, but alſo for thoſe that were to journey one by one. And therefore did Moſes conduct them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians ſhould K repent them of their diſmiſſion, and ſhould haſte them to purſue them, they might receive the reward of their wickedneſſe, and the breach of their promiſe. He choſe this way likewiſe, leſt the Paleſtines ſhould underſtand of their departure, by reaſon they were diſpleaſed againſt the Hebrews, becauſe of an ancient grudge which they bare them. Now doth Paleſtine confine and border upon Egypt; and therefore led he them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Canaan, by conducting them farre about, and thorow many calamities; to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to the Mountain of Sinai, where they might offer ſacrifice, according to Gods commandement. As ſoon as the Egyptians overtook the Iſraelites, they prepared themſelves L to fight, truſting themſelves to the number which they had, and ſhut themſelves into a place of ſecuritie: for with them, there ſerved ſix hundred chariots, with fifty thouſand horſemen, and two hundreth thouſand armed footmen. They had alſo ſtopped the paſſages, where through they thought the Hebrews might eſcape, encloſing them betwixt unacceſſible rocks, and the ſea: on which place there abutteth a mountain, unfrequented by reaſon of the dangerouſneſſe of the way; and by this meanes they excluded them from all hope of eſcape, or flight: for on the one ſide they were ſhut in by the mountain, that extended it ſelf even unto the ſea: and on the other ſide, by their camp, pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the Champion, if ſo be they intended to flie that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no ſecurity, but were hemmed in by the opportunitie of M the place, and by reaſon of their want, could not endure the ſiedge, and for that they could not find any iſſue to flie from their enemies; neither, although they greatly deſired to fight, had they meanes to defend themſelves, becauſe they were diſarmed. Finallie, when as they perceived that there was no hope of ſafetie left them, but onlie by their abject ſubmiſſion, they began to accuſe Moſes; forgetting thoſe prodegies, whereby God had forepromiſed them their libertie: and ſo far forgot they themſelves, that after having ſtoned the Prophet, and through incredulitie contemned Gods promiſes, they were reſolved to yield themſelves ſubject to their former thraldome. For they were exaſperated by the teares of their wives and children, who expected nothing but death, ſeeing themſelves be-

But although the multitude were exaſperated againſt Moſes, yet ceaſed he not to take care of them, and to think on God; laying before their eies that which he had ſaid in times paſt, as touching their deliverance, and aſſuring them, that God would not ſuffer them to be ſubjected or overthrown by their enemies; and ſtanding up in the midſt of them, he ſaid: If your affairs had hitherto been managed by men onely, it were not amiſſe in you to diſtruſt them, leſt hereafter they ſhould not bring them to their determined and your deſired iſſue. But in that at this time you diſtruſt the providence of God, this ſheweth you to be without ſenſe, or underſtanding; conſidering it is he that hath made you ſee all thoſe things which he hath promiſed you by me, tending to your ſalvation and deliverance; yea, even at that time
B when you your ſelves expected it not: you rather ought to hope, that God will help and aſſiſt you in theſe difficulties, who hath brought to paſſe, that you are now in this ſtraight, to the end that when he ſhall have delivered you from theſe extremities, from which neither you your ſelves, nor your enemies ſuppoſe that ye may eſcape, he may ſhew his force and providence in your behalf: For God is not accuſtomed to yeeld his favourable aſſiſtance when the dangers are onely eaſie and ſupportable, but in thoſe wherein all humane hope is void and exhauſted. Therefore repoſe your ſelves, and ſtay your fortunes upon ſuch a helper, who can make great things of ſmall, and maketh the ſtrongeſt feeble. Fear not the force and power of the Egyptians; neither for that you have the ſea and mountains before you, which permit you not to flie from them, deſpair not of your lives: for God (if he pleaſe) can turn

The Hebrewes are purſued by the Egyptians, the ſea divideth it ſelf, and giveth paſſage to the Hebrews.

THis ſaid, he conducted the Hebrews towards the ſea, in the ſight of the Egyptians. For they were within ſight of them, being very much wearied with purſuit and travel, and made their account that it ſhould be beſt for them to remit the combate until the next day.

But when Moſes was arrived upon the bank of the ſea, he took his rod and called upon
D God, and implored his aid and ſuccours in theſe words: O Lord, thou too well knoweſt that it is impoſſible for us by force or mans policy to eſcape theſe extremities: but thou art he onely that canſt ſave this company, who have forſaken Egypt, following thy commandment. And ſince of our ſelves we have not any hope or means, we onely recommend our ſelves unto thy providence, aſſuring our ſelves, that by that means onely we may be delivered from the purſuit and hatred of the Egyptians: Send us therefore ſpeedily thine aſſiſtance, to the end that thy power may be known in our weakneſſe. Relieve, encourage, and hearten thy people, aſſuring them of their ſafetie, who through their diſtruſt have ſinned againſt thee: we are environed with difficulties, which notwithſtanding thou canſt make eaſie. For, the ſea is thine, and this mountain that incloſeth us; the which ſhall open, and the E ſea alſo divide it ſelf into firm land, if thou commandeſt them. We may likewiſe flie thorow the air, if it pleaſe thy power to deliver us in that manner. Having made his requeſt unto God after this manner, he ſtrook the Red ſea with his rod; which ſuddenly dividing it ſelf at that ſtroke, and retyring backwards, left a drie paſſage thorow the midſt thereof, where thorow the Hebrews might eſcape. Moſes ſeeing how God had made himſelf known, and how the ſea had forſaken the land, and left his native channel; he firſt of all marched thorow the ſame, and commanded the Hebrews to follow him, marching thorow that way which God had in his divine power provided for them, willing them to rejoyce at the danger which attended their enemies, and to give God thanks for the unexpected ſuccours he had ſent them: who were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At the firſt the F Egyptians ſuppoſed them to be mad, and that they did headlong caſt themſelves into manifeſt perdition: but when they perceived that they were forwardly entred without danger, and that they encountred no danger or let, they diſlodged and followed them, as if the ſea ought to have given them iſſue alſo; and having ſet their horſe in the vaumgard, they began to deſcend and enter the way of the ſea. The Hebrewes perceiving that they ſpent the time in arming themſelves, haſted them to flie to the oppoſite ſhore, where they arrived without any diſturbance; which made their enemies more bold, ſuppoſing that no evil ſhould happen unto them. They ſuppoſed not that this path was made expreſſely for the Hebrews, but entred the ſame, as if it had been a common beaten way, forgetting that G it was made to ſave the Hebrews from danger, and not themſelves who ſought to ruinate them. But as ſoon as all the Egyptian army was entred thereinto; the ſea returned to his old courſe, and with winds and waves overwhelmed the Egyptians. The ſhowers from heauen fell upon them, vehement thunders ratled from the air, intermixed with flaſhings and the lightnings tempeſted upon them. In brief, there was nothing that through the wrath of God might be inflicted upon men, which at that time hapned not unto them. For, beſides all that which hath been ſpoken, and obſcure and dark night ſurpriſed them, in ſuch ſort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to bear back the tidings of their misfortune: That the Hebrewes could not contain themſelves, ſuch joy they had conceived through this their unexpected deliverance, and the total ruin of their H enemies: ſo that they aſſuredly perſwaded themſelves that they were delivered, by reaſon, that they who had made them ſlaves unto them perforce, were exterminated; and for that they had God ſo viſibly aſſiſtant unto them. When they had eſcaped this danger, and perceiving likewiſe that their enemies were in this ſort puniſhed, yea, and after ſuch a manner, as the like puniſhment hath never been heard of amongſt men; they all of them, during the whole night, ſung hymnes and ſongs of rejoyce. Moſes likewiſe compoſed an Ode in hexameter verſe, containing the praiſes of God, and a thankſgiving for the favour he had done unto them. All theſe things have I particularly declared, according as I have found them written in holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to marvel at this ſo wonderful a diſcourſe, that thorow the ſea there ſhould a paſſage be found, to ſave ſo many perſons in times paſt, and they rude and ſimple, whether it were done by the will of God, or that it chanced of it ſelf, ſince not long time ago, God ſo thinking it good, the ſea of Pamphylia I ſage, to deſtroy the Empire of the Perſians. the next day the Egyptian arms, tranſported by the force of the ſtream, were caſt a ſhore, into the army of the Hebrews: which when Moſes perceived that it was done by the providence of God, to the intent they might not be diſarmed, he gathered them together, and furniſhed the Hebrews therewith; who afterwards led them to the mountain of Sinai, to ſacrifice unto God: and he offered him thank-giving for their deliverance, in the behalf of the people, according as he himſelf had before-time commanded him.

The yeer of the world, 2454. before Chriſts Nativity, 1510.

THis new and unexpected deliverance of the Hebrews from their danger, was not a little obſcured by the wearineſſe and tediouſneſſe of their journey, which they endured in their travell towards the mountain of Sinai: by reaſon that the countrie was deſart, and inhabitable, deſtitute of victuals, and wholly deprived of waters; and not onely barren of that which ſerved for the ſuſtenance of men, but alſo everie waies deſtitute B of paſturage and proviſion for cattel: for it was not onelie drie, and utterlie deſtitute of water, but alſo deprived of all means to nouriſh and increaſe fruit. Now they were enforced to proſecute their way thorow this countrie, by reaſon they could not otherwiſe chuſe; ſo that they were conſtrained to bear with them the water which they had drawn before ſuch time as they entred the Deſart, according as their captain and conductor had commanded them: which being ſpent, they digged pits, out of which they drew water with great difficultie, by reaſon of the ſterility of the Countrie: and further, the water which they found in thoſe places was bitter, and no waies fit to drink; and that which was worſe, very little in quantity. Travelling onwards of their journey after this manner, they arrived about the evening in a certain place, which by reaſon the waters C thereabouts were brackiſh, they called Mara, that is to ſay, Bitterneſſe. There, wearied with their travel, and their proviſion failing them, they began to be travelled with neceſſitie ſo that they reſolved to ſtay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certain pit there, which although it were inſufficient to ſatisfie ſo great an armie, yet for that they found it in that countrie, it yeelded them no little conſolation. For they were given to underſtand, that if they travelled onwards, they ſhould find no water; and as touching the water of that pit, it was ſo bitter and unfit for their drinking, that it neither was agreeable with mens taſte, nor ſupportable for their very cattel likewiſe. Whereupon Moſes ſeeing them ſo diſcomforted, neither knowing in what ſort to ſatisfie them, in that he had not to deal with an oppoſite armie, or enemie, to the end, to enforce and to repel them with va- D lour; and for that he manifeſtly perceived, that not onely a troup of valiant men, but alſo a multitude of women and children were like to periſh; he was very ſore perplexed, not knowing what to do; and on himſelf he heaped the calamity of them all, as if himſelf onely were to bear the heavie burthen of their miſerie, for all of them had their recourſe unto him, and to no man elſe: the women beſought for their children, the husbands entreated for their wives, beſeeching him to take compaſſion of their deſolations, and to furniſh them with ſome means to eſcape their miſerie. He addreſſed himſelf therefore in moſt humble manner to beſeech Almightie God, that it might pleaſe him to convert the evil qualitie of the water, and to make it potable. Which grace and favour he no ſooner obtain- E ed, but he took the end of his ſtaffe, and caſt it at his feet, and afterwards brake it in the midſt, and cleft it long-wayes, and caſt it into the pit; giving the Hebrews to underſtand, that God had heard their prayers, and that he had promiſed them, to give them that water they deſired, if ſo be they would obey him, and with alacritie and diligence perform that which ſhould be commanded them. Hereupon diſlodging from that place, they came to Helim, a F countrie that a farre off ſeemed very pleaſant, by reaſon that it was planted with palm-trees: but the nearer they approched it, the more tedious they found it, (for there were no more then ſeventie palm-trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well grown by reaſon of the drineſſe and barrenneſſe of that Countrie; for they were not watred by the fountains, whereof there were twelve in that place, neither did any one of them yeeld any moiſture, to give them ſuſtenance) ſo that endeavouring themſelves to digge up the ſand. they could light on no veins of water, and if perhaps any little deal appeared, it was ſo troubled by their digging, as it became unfit to be taſted: neither did the trees bear any ſtore of fruit, by reaſon of the want of water. their guide, ascribing all the cause of their calamities and miseries unto him. For having marched for the space of thirty daies, they had consumed all that which they brought with them; and conceiving in their imagination, that there was no remedie, they were wholly surprised with despair. Bethinking them therefore onely of that evil which was before their eyes, and forgetting the marvels which God, by the Ministerie and prudence of Moses, had made them both see and partake, they conceived hatred against him, and were ready to stone him to death, as if he had been the author of that calamitie which oppressed them. But he perceiving the multitude so enraged and incensed against him, strengthened himself in God; and warranted by the testimony of a good conscience, and the uprightnesse of his actions, he came out into the midst of them; who reviled him, and had gathered stones to cast at him. And for that he was adorned with a singular grace and alluring countenance, and endued with pleasing eloquence, and fit to pacifie the popularity, he began to appease their wrath; exhorting them, not onely to forget their present difficulties, but also to remember their fore-passed blessings; not permitting, that the travel which they endured at that time, should drive out of their remembrance the graces and great good turns which they had received at Gods hands. He willed them likewise diligently to expect their deliverance from that extremity, by the providence of God: who (as it were likely) made trial of their vertue, to see what perseverance they had; or whether they kept in their remembrance those things which had hapned unto them; or whether forgetting their forepassed pleasures, they would suffer themselves to be swallowed with their present miserie. He willed them therefore to take heed, lest through their impatience and ingratitude, they should be found unworthy of Gods favour; who both neglected his will, by whose direction they were brought out of Egypt, and sore threatned and hated him, which was Gods Minister especially since hitherto they might no wayes complain of him in any thing, which he had undertaken to execute by the Commandement of God. Then reckoned he up particularly unto them, how the Egyptians were overthrown, and afflicted, whilest contrary to Gods will, they endeavoured to detain them: how the same river, which to them was bloudy and unprofitable to drink of, to themselves became both sweet and potable: likewise, how the sea retired it self, and furthered both their night and passage, werein they saw themselves secure and free from danger; and contrariwise, their enemies destroyed, overthrown, and drowned: and how, even until that day, being disarmed, they were by Gods providence both furnished and fortified abundantly. Again, how often God had delivered them from apparant death and danger, besides all mens opinion; who being All, and alwaies omnipotent, gave them at that time, no, not the least suspition of his assistance. For which cause, they were to suffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themselues, that the succour, although it were deferred, was never too late, which was received before such time as the danger had prevailed: and so to think, that God contemned not their perils, but that he made trial of their fortitude and free love, to see whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meat and drink: or rather, whether after the manner of bruit beasts, they had leifer be trained in servile travel, to the end they might be glutted like them, and made the better able to endure their labour. To conclude, that he nothing feared his life (because that being unjustly slain, no evil could happen unto him) but that he was fearful of their safety, lest lifting up their hands to stone him, they should be thought to oppose themselves against Gods ordinance. Thus pacified he them, and mollified the furie they had conceived to endanger his life: and so much prevailed he, that they repented them of that enterprise, whereby they sought to endanger him. And for that he knew that they had some reason to be thus moved, he addressed himself to prayer and supplication: and ascending a certain rock, he required Gods help to relieve their infirmities, wants, and affliction(, in whose hands onely the salvation of the people consisted; beseeching him in mercie to forgive the people, being exasperated with extreme miseries, and by reason thereof distracted, and withdrawn from their dutie. Whereupon God promised him to have care of the people; assuring him, to send them a speedy and present deliverance. Which when Moses understood, he came down unto the multitude; who perceiving him altogether refreshed with joy, by reason of those promises which he had received at Gods hands, exchanged their dolesome lamentations into a habit of delight. He therefore standing up in the midst of them, told them, that he brought unto them a most speedy remedy for their present necessitie. And not long after, a number of quails (which about the gulf of Arabia multiply and encrease, more then any other sorts of birds) flew and crossed the sea; and being wearied in their flight, and accustomably accosting and flying near to the ground, came and fell amidst the

Whereupon Moſes once more addreſſed himſelf to call upon God, yeelding him thanks for the preſent and the future good he had promiſed him. Who being after this manner fed and refreſhed, were preſently ſupplied with a new kind of food. For at ſuch time as Moſes ſtretched out his hands, and prayed unto God, a Dewe deſcended from Heaven, that thickned betwixt his hands: which, for that he ſuppoſed it to be another kind of ſuſtenance, ſent them by God, he taſted the ſame; and taking pleaſure therein, for that the people knew not what it was, but thought it to be ſnow which fell in that place, according to the ſeaſon of the year, he taught them, that it was no Dewe falling from Heaven, as they ſuppoſed, but that God had ſent them that grace, for the con-

B ſervation and nouriture of their bodies: and having eaten thereof, he gave them of it, to the end he might ſtrengthen their belief; who taſting the ſame in like manner as their Chieftain had done, were greatly refreſhed with the ſuſtenance: for in ſweetneſſe and pleaſure, it equalled the Honey; in odour, Bdellium; and in form and greatneſſe, the grain of a Coriander ſeed: of which, every one gathered. And by Commandement it was enjoyned that every one of them ſhould particularly gather every day the Meaſure of an Aſſaron, which is the tenth part of an Epha, to the end that no one ſhould be ſcanted of this food: which was done to that end, leſt the weaker ſhould want, whileſt the ſtronger, through avarice, ſhould gather more then ſufficed them. And if any one, contrary to the preſcript command, had gathered more then was permitted him, although he toiled and travelled more then any

C of them, yet was his portion no waies encreaſed by that means. For whatſoever (beſide the appointed Meaſure of the Aſſaron) remained till the next morning, was of no value, through bitterneſſe; and was putrified, through wormes. So divine and admirable was this kind of food, and of that nature, that whoſo had ſufficient thereof, needed no other ſort of ſuſtenance. Moreover, even in theſe our daies, all that countrie is beſtrewed and bedewed with that kind of Aliment, which God, in favour of Moſes, ſent for the peoples ſuſtenance. The Hebrewes call it Manna; for in our Tongue, Man, is an interrogation, ſignifying, what is that? Thus lived they then joyfully, being ſuſtained by this kind of meat, ſent them from Heaven, and uſed the ſame for the ſpace of fourtie yeares, during that time which they lived

D in the Deſart. But afterwards when they were diſlodged from that place, and encamped neer to Raphidim, they were extreamly travelled with thirſt; where, upon their firſt arrival, they found ſome few ſprings, but afterwards they found the land wholly deſtitute of Water. They therefore once more were incenſed againſt Moſes. But he withdrawing himſelf apart from the furie of the people, converted himſelf unto God in prayer; beſeeching him, that as he had given them food in their neceſſity, he would now alſo give them drink at that preſent, wherein they were welnigh choaked with thirſt; praying him to provide them of drink alſo, or otherwiſe, that their meat was unprofitable to them: Whereon God preſently granted his prayer; promiſing Moſes, that he would give him a Fountain, and abundance of Water, from that place from whence he leaſt expected it. Hereon he commanded

E him, that ſtriking upon the Rock with his Rod, which was there by hard at hand, he ſhould from thence ſeek that which they demanded and wanted; aſſuring him, that every one, without travaile or labour, ſhould have ſufficient therefro. Which counſaile when Moſes had received from Gods hands, he returned unto the people, who expected him, and had their eyes fixed upon him: for at that time they beheld him deſcending from the Rock, where he had made his prayer. No ſooner was he arrrived, but he told them that God would in like ſort deliver them from that neceſſitie, and would graciouſly grant them an unexpected relief; telling them, that a floud ſhould ſuddenly break from the Rock. But they being amazed at that which they heard, and doubting leſt tyred with thirſt, and travailed by journeyes, they ſhould be enforced to hew and cleave the Rock: Moſes ſtruck the ſame in ſuch

F ſort with his Rod, that he divided it in ſunder, and delivered out moſt cleare and pure Water in great abundance. The people were very ſore aſtoniſhed at this ſo ſtrange accident: ſo that beholding the Water, their thirſt was quenched. They afterward drunk of the Water, and found it very ſweet and pleaſant, reſembling in the goodneſſe of it, the divine bountie and power of the Giver thereof. For this cauſe they highly eſteemed Moſes, ſeeing that God had honoured him in this ſort; and they acknowledged Gods providence, and their thankſgiving, by their Sacrifices; humbly thanking him for the care he had over them. The ſacred Scriptures likewiſe, which are kept and conſecrated in the Temple teſtifie, that God had fore-told Moſes alſo, that Water ſhould in this ſort iſſue from the Rock.

How the Amalekites and their Associates were overcome, and how great a prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2.

BUt when the renown of the Hebrews waxed great, and was spread in the eares of all men, (so as the bruit thereof was heard in every part) it came to passe, that the inhabitants of that countrie were in very great fear: Whereupon (sending Embassages the one unto the other) they mutually incited themselves to expel and utterly ruinate the whole Nation.

Exod. 17. 8, 9. The Amalechites warre against the Israelites.

Amongst the rest, those of the countrie of Cobol, and the Citie Petra, (who are called Amalechites, a Nation very warlike, and more active then the rest) were the chief Agents in this Expedition: whose Kings both encouraged one another, and whetted their neighbour Nations to the Israelites destruction; telling them, that a forrain Army, flying from the thraldome of the Egyptians, had invaded their countrie, whose increases were not a little to be suspected; counselling them (before they had gathered head, and recovered more means, and a countrie to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident, by reason of their forbearance) to charge them first, rather then to expect their increases, and so to oppresse them; esteeming it a better point of wisedome, to represse their insolencie and forwardnesse in the Dessart, then to expect whilest they were possessed of strong Cities, and rich means. For this (said they) is the part of wise men, to resist the uprisings and power of their adversaries; and not to expect, whilest by daily exploits they more and more increase; and rather to provide to prevent, then deliver themselves from peril. After these Embassages, it was decreed by general counsel, That they should endeavour to confront and assault the Hebrews. These determinations and designes of theirs, amated and troubled Moses very much, for that he expected no hostilitie. When therefore he perceived, that the people were affrighted and amazed, to see themselves (being wholly unprovided) to be changed by so strong and well-furnished an Armie, he recomforted them, and willed them to bethink themselves of Gods promises, who by his power had set them at libertie; assuring them, that they should overcome all those that made partie and head against them, to destroy them wishing them to think, that though they were inferiour unto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and such like; yet since they had God to friend, and ready to fight for them against their enemies, that they ought to conceive such courage, as if they were furnished with far more then humane supplies. Alleadging further, that they were not ignorant, how great an Assister God was, having had so often tryal of his goodnesse in their greatest dangers, whom both he knew to be an enemie to their enemies, and favourable to their proceedings: which favour of his, he most manifestly expressed, by his miraculous deliverance of them from the hunger and thirst, by yeelding them free escape, when they were shut in by Sea and mountaines: And that which should most animate them to the fight and victory at that time, was, That after this plague, they should want nothing that appertained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moses thus having encouraged the people by his words, he called unto him the chiefest of the Tribes, and everie one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publick assembly, commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their General. But they contemning their danger, and desirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would prove the final end of their calamitie. For which cause, they instantly besought Moses to lead them forth against the enemie, praying him not to dull the alacritie of the souldiers, by any untimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out among the whole multitude, such as were most fit for Warre) he chose Jesus the sonne of Naveus, the Ephramite, to lead them; a man valiant in Armes, and provident in counsel, and exceeding in piety, and not degenerating in that respect from Moses his Master. He also in such sort disposed certain Bands, that he might not in any sort be cut off from Water: he left also so many as might guard the multitude, and keep the Camp and weaker company. Thus stood they all the night long in a readinesse to take Armes, such as they had fitted for them, expecting their Captaines, who should lead them out to fight as soon as Moses should command them. On the other side, Moses slept not, but instructed Josuah how he should conduct the Armie. And as soon as the day appeared, he encouraged Josuah to shew himself such a one in that battel, as both the place wherewith he was honoured, and the cause for which they fought, required; wishing him, by his prowesse and good deserts, to give life and courage to his souldiers that followed him. He likewise exhorted the chiefest of the Hebrews in particular, and in general heartned and emboldned all others that entred the battel.

v. 9. Josuah made Captain over the Israelites.

And

A And as touching himſelf, (after he had thus diſpoſed the Army, by words and effect) he retired himſelf unto a mountain, committing the army to Gods protection; and Joſuahs conduct. Then encountred the Armies on both ſides, and every one fought moſt valiantly; neither wanted there encouragements on either ſides. And as long as Moſes lifted up his hands, the Hebrewes had the better againſt the Amalechites. But for that he was unable continually to ſupport the ſame, (and becauſe he throughly perceived and obſerved, that as often as he held down his hands, ſo long the enemies drove the Iſraelites to retreat) he willed his brother Aaron, and Uron his ſiſter Maries husband) to ſtand on each ſide of him, and ſuſtaine his hands, and ſuccour him, for fear his forces ſhould fail him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrews by main force overcame the Amalechites; ſo that all of them B had been ſlain, if ſo be the chaſe had continued, and had not been cut off by the approach of the night. At this time our predeceſſours obtained a moſt happy and neceſſary victory: For they had the upper hand over them that were embattelled againſt them, and aſtoniſhed and amated the nations round about, and got great ſtrength and riches by their travel. For being ſeized of the enemies Camp, they generally got great riches; and particularly were all of them relieved; whereas before that time they had not neceſſary meanes to maintain themſelves. And this victory of theirs was the cauſe of their very great good fortune, not onely for the preſent, but alſo for the time to come: For not onely had they their enemies bodies under their ſubjection, but alſo their ſpirits; ſo as they were feared by all the Nations round about. And they multiplied both in ſtrength and riches; for there was a great quantity of Gold and Silver taken in the Camp. Divers veſſels likewiſe and Tables of C Braſſe were found therein: likewiſe great quantity of Tiſſue-work, and excellent furniture for Arms. Moreover, they had all their baggage, Tents, Harneſſe, and Horſes; and generally, the whole proviſion of an arranged battel became their prey. Then after alſo they became more vertuous, and induſtrious then before; ſuppoſing that the end of all actions was obtained by induſtry. Thus ended this battel. The next day, Moſes cauſed the enemies that were ſlain, to be rifled, and gathered the ſcattered armes of thoſe that fled. He honoured them alſo, that had bravely demeaned themſelves in the battel, and prayſed the Captain Joſuah in publick; whoſe honour was confirmed by the applauſe of the whole Army. There was not one Hebrew that periſhed that day: and ſo many of the enemies were D there put to the ſword, as their number cannot be expreſſed. He offered likewiſe a Sacrifice of thankſgiving unto God, and erected an Altar unto him, and dedicated it to God, the Victor. He prophecied moreover, that all the Amalechites ſhould be utterly extinguiſhed ſo that none of them ſhould be left alive, in that they had aſſaulted the Hebrewes, and that in the Deſart, and at ſuch time as they were in affliction. He feaſted the General in like ſort. This iſſue had this battel; which was the firſt that was levied againſt them, or durſt aſſault them, ſince their departure out of Egypt. But as ſoon as Moſes had celebrated a feaſt in memory of the victory, to the end he might give the Hebrews ſome repoſe after the battel above-named, he cauſed them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed ſouldiers. Thus paſſing onwards by little and little, they arrived the third moneth af- E ter their departure out of Egypt, near to the mountain of Sinai, where (as before-time it hath been declared) Moſes ſaw the Viſion in the Buſh, and other ſuch like wonders.

What counſel Raguel gave to his ſonne in law.

WHen Raguel, Moſes father in law, underſtood of this his good ſucceſſe, he came with great joy unto Moſes, under purpoſe to ſalute him, his daughter Zephora, and her children: who (greatly rejoycing at his arrival) prepared a Sacrifice, and feaſted the people near unto the Buſh that could not be F conſumed by fire; and in the banquet time, the people was diſtinguiſhed, according to the order and place of every family. But Aaron, with the aſſiſtance took Raguel, and they ſung prayſes unto God, aſcribing to him both the means and manner of their liberty. They alſo ſpake much in honour of their General, by whoſe vertue all things had had ſo fortunate an iſſue: Raguel on his ſide highly prayſed the people, and dignified Moſes their Governour, by whoſe prudence ſo many good and valiant men were guided. But on the next day, Raguel ſeeing Moſes oppreſſed with the multitude of buſineſſe, (by reaſon that he decided all their debates that appealed unto him; who were thus perſwaded of him, that at that time they were rightly cenſured, when Moſes gave the ſentence; and they that were condemned by him, endured endured the verdict patiently, knowing that their cauſe was by him decided rather by the rule of juſtice, then the inſtinct of amerce) he for that time kept ſilence (in that he was loth to hinder them, who any waies pretended to receive any fruit of the vertue of his ſonne in law.) But when he found him at his convenient leiſure, he withdrew him apart, and told him betwixt them twaine, that which he ought to do; counſelling him, that he ſhould diſcharge himſelf of that pain, concerning affairs of ſo little conſequence, and reſerve onely to himſelf thoſe affairs which were of the greateſt importance, and concerned the publique eſtate of them all. For that there were divers perſons amongſt the Hebrews to be found, who would be capable and ſufficient to hear and determine the Pleas; but touching the care of many thouſand ſoules, no man could undertake it except he were another Moſes. Knowing therefore (ſaid he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou haſt behaved thy ſelf toward the people, being the Miniſter of God, as concerning their ſafety; ſuffer them to comprimiſe amongſt themſelves thoſe actions and quarrrels that fall amongſt them, and reſerve this intereſt to thy ſelf, that thou maieſt wholly intend the ſervice of God, whereby thou maieſt more eaſily exempt the people from their preſent neceſſities. If therefore thou giveſt credit to my counſels in humane affairs, thou ſhalt make diligent ſearch and muſters of thy whole Army, and thou ſhalt eſtabliſh Chieftains, that ſhall Govern over ten thouſands, and thouſands, and five hundreths, and over fifties; and ſhalt ordain Governours over them, who dividing them by thirties, twenties, and tennes, may conduct and govern them. And let ſome be appointed amongſt them, who may receive their Titles, according to the number and names of thoſe he commandeth; who being approved by the whole company, to be of good fame and upright conſcience, may cenſure and compound all their differences. And if any controverſie ſhall fall out amongſt any of them, in authority, they ſhall refer the deciding of that difficulty to thine own perſon. By this means neither ſhall any one of the Hebrewes be defrauded of his right, and thou thy ſelf ſerving God without moleſtation, mayeſt procure God to be more favourable unto thine Armie.

He hath likewiſe written in his books that Raguel was the author of this Government: accounting it no leſſe honour, to attribute praiſe to thoſe that deſerue it, then ſhame to uſurp upon another mans deſart; ſo that hereby you may conjecture his vertue: of which, hereafter in many places we have more to ſay. Moſes afterwards aſſembling all the people, told them that he would aſcend the mountain of Sinai, to talk with God; to the end, that he might afterwards return unto them, and impart unto them whatſoever profitable thing he had received from him in their behalf. He likewiſe commanded them to pitch their Tents about the mountain, and to have it in reverence, by reaſon of the Proximitie of God.

CHAP. IIII.

Moſes aſcendeth the mountain, and receiveth the Tables of the ten Commandements at Gods hands, and gave them to the people.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. Moſes aſcendeth the mountain of Sinai Exod. 19. 2, 3, 4, 14, &c.

THis ſaid, he aſcended the mountain Sinai (which is the higheſt, beyond compariſon of all that Countrie; and which, by reaſon of his ſtrange height, and for his ſteep and inacceſſible ragged rocks, is not onelie unfrequented by men, but alſo may not be beheld, by reaſon it travelleth the eie.) Further, for that it is reported, that God converſeth and dwelleth on the ſame, it is held ſacred by the inhabitants, and dreadful and unacceſſible to all that behold it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commandement of the Prophet, removing their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, ſuſpending their judgments, and expecting the execution of the promiſes of thoſe goods which Moſes had fore-prophecied unto them, at ſuch time as he returned from God. And in the mean ſpace, while they expected their Guide, they kept holiday, and feaſted, and purified themſelves for the ſpace of three daies, in all ſorts of purification, and abſtinence from the companie of their wives, following that which Moſes had commanded them. They beſought God alſo, that he would be favourable, and aſſiſt Moſes, and by his means to bleſſe them with ſome favour, that might make their life good and happy. They banquetted alſo in great pomp, and their wives and children were richly attired. Now, after they had feaſted fourtie daies ſpace, on the third day, before Sun-riſing, a Cloud covered all the Hebrewes Camp (a thing before-time unſeen by them) and environed all the

A the place where they pitched their Pavillions And although all the reſt of the countrey had a clear and untroubled skie, yet thereabout violent windes were raiſed, & hideouſly roared, and a tempeſtious Rain ſucceeded them; and Thunderclaps dreadfull to heare, and Lightnings horrible to behold, ſignified that God was there preſent, and that Moſes) with good ſucceſſe, and for their profit) had conferred with them. Let thoſe that read this, judge thereof, as it ſhall pleaſe them: but as touching my ſelf, it is not any waies lawful for me to depart in any ſort from that which is written in holy Scripture. That which the Hebrews both heard and ſaw, in that it was ſtrange and unaccuſtomed unto them troubled them greatly. Furthermore, the report that was publiſhed as touching that mountain. That God repaired and dwelt on the ſame, marvellouſly amated their ſpirits. They therefore ſad & penſive, con-
B tain'd themſelves within their Tents, thinking that Moſes was deſtroyed through the wrath of God, and expecting no leſſe miſery themſelves. But whileſt they were thus troubled in thought, Moſes preſented himſelf unto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleaſing majeſtie, and looks ſo contented, as they teſtified the inward conſolation of his mind) whom they no ſooner beheld, but ſuddenly all their fear vaniſhed, and in place thereof a hope of ſome great good hap ſucceeded; and withal, the ayre, upon his arrival, recovered his former clearneſſe and ſerenitie. Hereupon he ſummoned the people to a ſolemne and generall aſſembly, to the end he might report, and they hear, what commandements God had given them by him. No ſooner were they aſſembled, but he (from an upper place, to the eud that all the people might both ſee and hear him) ſtood up and ſpake after this manner:
Know (ſaith he) you Hebrewes, that almighty God, as he hath never neglected my praiers
C hitherto, ſo at this time alſo hath he enterrained me (being your Truchman and meſſenger) very graciouſly: and behold himſelf here in preſence in your company, and propitious to your ſupplications, ready to provide you of meat to ſuſtain your bodies, and order & diſpoſe your policy, to make it laſting and happy. Now although that you ſee me, and that a humane tongue ſpeaketh unto you, yet deſpiſe not my words, no more then you do his works, already executed and teſtified upon our nation. For if you conſider the worth and wonder
D thereof you ſhall conceive his greatneſſe that hath brought them to paſs, & hath never denied to talk with me, and hear me, when I ſpake for your profit. For it is not Moſes, the ſon of Amram and of Iocabel, but he it is that conſtrained Nilus to flow with blood, & that through divers plagues hath tamed the pride of the Egyptians: it is he that hath given you paſſage thorow the midſt of the Sea: it is he that hath furniſhed you with meat prepared from heaven, at ſuch time as you were in extremity: it is he that made water ſpring out of the rock, to cool your thirſts, at ſuch time as they were in neceſſiity: it is he by whom Adam had the poſſeſſion & fruition both of the fruit of the earth, and the fiſhes of the Sea: by him Noe eſcaped from the Deluge: by him, our ancient father Abraham, of a wandring Pilgrim became an Inhabiter of the Land of Canaan: by him, Iſaac was born, at ſuch time as his father and mother were old (by him, Iacob hath been ennobled, by the vertue of his twelve ſons: by him, Ioſeph became Lord over all the forces of the Egyptians: He it is that graciouſly im-
E parteth theſe words unto you, by me his meſſenger. Let therefore theſe wholſom Lawes of his be holy and inviolable amongſt you, and more dear unto you then either your wives and children: for in obſerving the ſame, you ſhall lead a happy life, enjoy a fruitful countrey, a calm Sea, and a progeny made happy, according to the lawes of nature; finally, you ſhall become alwaies dreadfull unto your enemies: for I have talked face to face with God, and have heard his immortall voice; ſo dearly beloved are you unto him, and ſo careful is he of the proſperity of your nation. This ſaid, he conducted the people, (both men, women, and children) to the end they might hear God talk unto them, and teach them what to do (for fear the law ſhould have been in leſſer regard, if it had been preſented to their underſtandings by a humane tongue: (they all of them therefore heard his voice deſcending from the mountain, ſo that every one underſtood the ſame. But theſe precepts which Moſes left regiſtred in two Tables, is not lawful for me to expreſſe in ſo many words, and therefore I will expreſſe the ſentences. For he teacheth us:
F

Firſt of all, that there is one God, who is onely to be worſhipped:
Secondly, that no image of any creature is to be adored.
Thirdly, that no man ought to ſwear raſhly.
Fourthly, that the ſeventh day is not to be prophaned by any work.
Fiftly, that father and mother ſhould be honoured.
Sixtly, that we ſhould abſtain from murther.
Seventhly, that adultery is not to be committed.

When the multitude with great joy had heard God himſelf ſpeak unto them (according as Moſes had foretold them) he diſmiſſed them, and each one departed to his Tent. But ſome few daies after they preſented themſelves before his Pavilion, beſeeching him that he ſhould bring them thoſe Lawes, which he had received at Gods hands: he to the intent to gratifie them opened the Lawes, and preſcribed unto each of them what they ought to do at the ſame time, as in due place it ſhall be expreſſed. But the greater part of the Lawes I deferre till another time, meaning in private to comment thereupon. About the very ſame time, Moſes, once more aſcended the mountain of Sinai (having premoniſhed the people thereof) and aſcended the ſame in their ſights: but when the time ſeemed tedious unto them (for he H was ſequeſtred from them for the ſpace of fourty daies) they were in great fear, leſt ſome inconvenience had hapned unto them; neither were they ſo much agreeved at that which had chanced unto them, as for that they were perſwaded of the death of Moſes. For there fell a contention amongſt them, the one affirming that he was dead, and devoured of wild beaſts (which was there opinion, who conceived a hatred againſt him) the other ſaid that he was raviſhed up unto God: but they of the wiſer ſort among them, who took no pleaſure to hear any one of their ſuppoſitions, contained themſelves; being equally affected in reſpect of both the opinions: for that the one ſeemed not to be eſtranged from humane chance, and the other had ſome correſpondence with the virtues of the man: ſo that they endured his fortune with an equall minde, and lamented their own miſ-hap, in that they were deprived of ſuch a Governour and Patron as he was, and whoſe like they thought it a matter impoſſible to finde: neither did their care ſuffer them to hope, neither deprived of hope could they chooſe I but complaine: neither durſt they remove their Tents, in that they were commanded to expect his return. At length (when fourtie daies and fourtie nights were paſt) he returned unto them: having (during that time) taſted no mortall ſuſtenance: and by his arrivall the whole hoſt was repleniſhed with great joy; whom he certified that Gods providence was alwaies aſſiſting them, and that during the time of thoſe daies, he had learned the meanes how they ſhould live civily, orderly, and bleſſedly; telling them that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereunto he would deſcend as often as it pleaſed him, which alſo in their travel they might carry about with them: ſo that they ſhould have no more need to aſcend unto Sinai, but that he himſelf might come and lodge with them, and be aſſiſtant to their praiers. He told them likewiſe the meaſure, and order of the ſaid Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing, but that they preſently addreſſed themK ſelves to the building thereof. This ſaid, he ſhewed them the two Tables, containing the ten Commandements written therein, in each of them five: now were theſe written by the hand of God. They all of them (rejoycing at that which they had heard and ſeen) ceaſed not to imploy themſelves to their uttermoſt: ſo that they brought in ſilver, gold, braſſe, and ſtore of wood fit for building; and which would not be wormeaten, the haires of goats, and the skins of ſheep, the one died azure, and the other white; wools of the ſame colour, fine linen, ſtones inchaſed in gold, wherewith men were accuſtomed to deck themſelvs, with great quantity of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, which was made like to a portable and moving Temple: this ſtuffe being thus gathered together, and collected with L ſo great affection (according to each mans utmoſt ability, he appointed work-maſters according to the Commandement of God, but ſuch, as the like might not have been choſen, although the matter had been committed to the peoples ſuffrages; their names are now likewiſe extant in the volumes of the ſacred Scriptures. Beſeleel of the tribe of Iuda, the ſon of Vron of the tribe of Iuda, and Mary Moſes ſiſter: and Eliab the ſon of Iſamach, of the tribe of Dan. The people ſhewed themſelves ſo forward in the finiſhing of this work, that Moſes was compelled to reſtrain them, cauſing it to be proclaimed, that they had ſufficiently gathered for the work already: for the work-maſters certified him no leſſe. They therefore addreſſed themſelves to finiſh the Tabernacle, being particularly inſtructed by Moſes of the meaſure M and greatneſſe thereof, and how many veſſels they ought to have, according to the modle which God had propoſed to Moſes. The women alſo ſtrove with emulation to exceed each other in the making of the veſtures of the Prieſts, and other things which were convenient for that work, to the end to honour the ſervice of God.

CHAP. V.

The yeer of the world, 2455. before the nativity of Chriſt, 1509.

NOw when all things were prepared for this work, as gold, braſſe, and woven work, Moſes commanded them to feaſt, and ſacrifice each one according to his abilitie, and ſet forward the building of the Tabernacle. Firſt of all therefore he meaſured the outward court, which in breadth contained fifty, and in length one hundred cubits, in ſuch manner as followeth. He raiſed pales of five cubits high, and twenty in length, from the one ſide to the other, and ten in breadth; in the hind-ſide to every one of theſe pales or poſts there were faſtned rings, the chapiters whereof were ſilver, and the baſes thereof gold, and the lower parts of theſe reſemble the points of a ſpear made of braſſe, and fixed in the earth. Thorow the rings there paſſed certain cords of five cubits length, which on the one ſide faſtned in the ground with brazen nayles of a cubits length, did faſten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle againſt the force of windes. Then was there a moſt fine ſilken curtain drawn about the ſame, which hanging from the chapiters of the baſes, and incloſing all that place, ſeemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three ſides of the incloſure arrounded. But the fourth ſide, being of fiftie cubits, was the front of the whole frame; the door whereof was twenty cubits wide, having on both ſides double barres in ſtead of poſts; and theſe alſo were of ſilver, except the baſes which were of braſſe; and on both ſides there ſtood three barres well faſtned, which were alſo hung round about with a Curtain of woven ſilk: but at the gate there hung a vail of twenty cubits long, and five deep, woven of purple, violet and fine ſilk, embroidered with divers flowers, without any figures of ſenſible creatures: within the gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foot of the ſame metall, wherein the Prieſts might waſh their hands and feet. And after this manner was the incloſure of the Court; In the midſt hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the Eaſt, that the riſing Sunne might ſhine upon it: the length thereof was thirty cubits, and the breadth twelve; the one of the walls thereof was towards the South, another towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the Weſt; and it was as high as long; and on each ſide there were twenty woodden plankes fourſquare, and joyned together, four fingers thick, and a cubit and a half broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and every boord had two hinges, which were put thorow the two baſes that were of ſilver, and in their ſockets received the hinges of the boords; the planks of the Weſt wall were ſix in number, and gilded both within and without, all of them ſo cloſed together, as it ſeemed to be but one wall. But on both ſides there were certain boords nearly joyned together, which in breadth contained the meaſure of one cubit and an half, and in thickneſſe, the third part of a hand breadth, and ſo made up thirty cubits; but ſix boords made up the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were joyned other two boords cut half a cubit broad, which they placed in the corners in ſtead of whole ones: every boord had rings of gold faſtned to the outward front thereof, riveted in order, and anſwering one another on every ſide. Thorow theſe rings were put certain bars which were covered with Gold, every one five cubits long, which joyned the boords together: and the end of every barre was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a box. And on the backſide of the walles of the Tabernacle, there was one rank of barres placed long-waies, paſſing thorow all the plankes, in which by hookes or haſpes, the ſides of either were held together, and riveted and faſtned one within the other; by which means the tabernacle was ſecured from the force of winds, and kept ſteddy and immoveable. Within the length thereof was divided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubits, on the inſide were placed four pillars made of the ſame work and matter, planted on like baſes, and diſtant one from the other by equall ſpaces overthwart, beyond theſe was the ſecret place. The reſt of the Tabernacle was for all the Prieſts; and this tripartite diviſion of the Tabernacle reſembled the nature of the world; for the third part (which was contained within the four pillars, to which the Prieſts had no acceſſe) did in a manner repreſent heaven the ſeat of God: but the ſpace of twenty cubits (which was onely permitted to the Prieſt, and was unacceſſible to others) reſembled the ſea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed five pillars upon brazen baſes; after theſe the Curtaines were ſpred about the Tabernacle, woven of ſilk, and embroidered with purple, violet, and ſcarlet colours; the firſt of theſe was ſpred ten cubits every way, and was drawn about the pillars, which ſeparated the Adyt from the other ſpace, and ſevered it from the ſight of men; and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that that was ſituate beyond the four Pillars, it was called the Sanctum ſanctorum, or holy of holieſt; and this Curtain or Veyl was pictured with all ſorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diverſified with all that which might give it ornament; but that there were no figures of living creatures to be found therein. The ſecond Veyl equalled the firſt in greatneſſe, workmanſhip, and colour, and incompaſſed the five Pillars of the entry; which reaching from the top to the midſt of them, and faſtned to each of them by a certain Ring, gave acceſſe to the Prieſts that entred the ſame. To this almoſt was there annexed on the out-ſide, another Veyl of like highneſſe, and woven of Linnen, drawn upon Cords from the one ſide to the other, by means of certain Rings; which was ſometimes ſpread, and other times (eſpecially on the holy-dayes) unſpred, leſt it ſhould hinder the peoples ſight: on the other dayes (eſpecially ſuch as were cloudy) it was ſpred, and ſerved for a coverture to defend the painted Veyl from the weather. Sithence, that cuſtome hath continued, after the building of the Temple, that another ſuch like Veyl (as this) ſhould be ſpread in the entrance. Beſides this, there were ten other Veyles, four cubits broad, and twenty eight cubits long, with certain golden hookes, enchated the one within the other, to the end to conjoyn them, ſo that they ſeemed to be one; which being ſpread, did cover the Tabernacle in the upper part, and the walles on the ſides, and behind; not extending to the earth within the compaſſe of a foot. Moreover, there were eleven other hangings of equal breadth, but longer; namely, every one of them of thirty cubits, woven with as great Art of Haires, as the other out of Wool; which covering all the reſt, extending to the earth, reſembled the form of a Bed-chamber; one of them covered and extended from the front, which being the eleventh, was annexed to this uſe. Theſe alſo were covered with certain skinnes ſewed together, which protected the ſame againſt the ſtorm and injury of the rain. For which cauſe to them that beheld it from farre, it ſeemed a thing moſt worthy of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other ſort ſhine, then as if a man ſhould have beheld the Heavens. But the Veyles of hair and skinnes hung after ſuch manner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, ſet to reſiſt the force and outrages of ſtormes and tempeſts.

Of the Ark, wherein Moſes placed the Tables of the Law.

Exod. 37. 1. ad 6. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8.

After that the Tabernacle was after this manner builded, they erected alſo an Ark which was dedicated unto God, of a certain Wood that was naturally ſtrong; and ſuch as was permanent, and reſiſted corruption. This, in our native Tongue, is called Heoron, framed after this manner: The length thereof was of five handfuls, and the breadth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was covered with golden plates, and it had a cover fitted with golden hinges, equal on every ſide. And to every ſide in length there were faſtned two Rings of Gold, driven and rivetted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certain barres of Gold were thruſt, that whenſoever there were any need, it might be carried any waies: for neuer was it born on beaſts backs, but the Prieſts bare it on their ſhoulders. On the cover thereof there were two ſemblances planted, which the Hebrews call Cherubins, (which are winged creatures, of a ſtrange form, the like whereof were never ſeen by any man) which Moſes ſaw figured on Gods Seat. In this Ark he placed the Tables, containing the ten Commandements, in every one five, and in every page two and a half, and this Ark hid he within the Sanctuary.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Table and Candleſtick of Gold, and of the Altar of the Tabernacle.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9. The Table. Exod. 37. à v. 10. ad finem.

In the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not unlike to that at Delphos, two cubits in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feet thereof, from the middeſt downwards, were like thoſe feet which the Doriens ſet unto their Beds; but that which aſcended from the other half upwards, was ſquare. The bodie of this Table was arounded with a border, ſtanding out four fingers length; and in every of the feet, there were Rings faſtened about the top of the foot, to which were annexed on both ſides two things, after the manner of handles, gilded, and framed of moſt firm wood, which were not thruſt thorow the circle on both ſides, like barres, but with a button took hold of the upper border of the Table, and beneath comprehended the ring of the foot, being a means to transfer it whitherſoever need required. This was wont to be placed

A in the Temple towards the North wall, not far from the Sanctuary: and on it were placed twelve unleavened loaves, set six by six, the one over against the other, and made of two Assars of the purest wheat, which measurr of the Hebrews contained seven Cotylas of the Athenians; and above these loaves two golden pots filled with frankincense; but after seven daies, other loaves were set in their place on the festival day, which we call the Sabbath. The cause of which ceremonie shall hereafter be declared by us. Hard by the Table neer the South wall, was placed a Candelstick of molten gold (but not solid) of an hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrews call Cinchares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with bowles, lillies, pomegranats, and little cups; then arising upwards from one base, it was divided into seven branches, according to the number of the B Sun & the rest of the Planets: is stretched out likewise into seven heads having orderly correspondence the one with the other, on which were planted seven candles, according to the number of the seven planets, which branched out towards the East and South, in that the Candlestick was set sidelong. Between this & the Table (as is said) was a little Altar erected for incense, made of lasting wood likewise, and covered on every side with a solid plate, being a cubit broad from every corner, and twice as high, on which there stood a little hearth environed with a golden crown on every side, in which were rings with their bars and staves, whereby it might be born by the Preists in the way. There was another Altar of wood also before the doore of the Tabernacle, covered with plates of brasse, five cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with brasse, the hearth whereof was
C made after the manner of a grate: for the earth received whatsoever fire fell from above, by reason there was no base there under, but neer unto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and censors, and cups, with other instruments made for the divine service, all which were of pure gold.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the vestments of the Priest, and of the high Priest.

SVCH was the Tabernacle with all that belonged thereunto. Now remaineth for D me to discourse as well of the vestments of the other Priests, which they call Chaneas, as of the Priest, whom they name Sar-Hazbachim, signifying thereby the high Priest. And first of all as touching the ordinary Priest. When as the Sacrificer purified according to the purification, which is ordained by the law) addresseth himselfe to sacrifice: he first of all investeth himself, with Manachasses (which is as much to say, a trusse or restrainer, which is a kind of breach or slop, covering the privities, made of woven silk) where thorow he thrusts his feet, as in a pair of upper breaches, and fasten the same about his loins: On this he casts a linnen shirt or surplice, made of double linnen (which we call Chetomene) and the word signifieth a linnen garment or surplice;
E for we call linnen Cheton (that kind of garment is a coat comming down to the ankles, bound to the bodie; having narrow sleeves about the armes) which is tied upon the brest a little beneath the armeholes, with a girdle four fingers broad, inwardly void, so wrought as it seemed to be like a serpents skinn.) It is likewise pictured with red, purple, Hyacinthine, and silken flowers, but the ground is onely silk; which being twice doubled about his breast, extendeth down to his ankles at such time as he desisteth from sacrifice,) and this seemed they to wear in way of ornament) but when as he is to minister in sacrifice, then (lest blown up by the wind, it should hinder his work) he casts it on his left shoulder. This girdle Moses calleth Abaneth, and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians, name it Emian, (for so they call it. This coat was in no manner pleited, and in the neck hath a broad opening, fastned about the two shoulders with clapses, from the edg of the coller to the brest and the middest of the back: This call they Massabassanes. But on his head he weareth
F a hat (not made with a high crown, neither comprehending the whole head, but somewhat more then the half:) this is called Masnaemphthes; which is decked and dight after such a rate, that it seemed a Chapplet made of a thick Riban, or of woven linnen oftentimes doubled and sowed, which in the upper part is covered with another linnen, descending to the front, hiding those seems of the Riban which were unseemly to be beheld: this is curiously fitted, lest during the time of sacrifice it should slip off. Such in generall were the ornaments of the priests.

The high Priest also useth the very same (omitting none of those things which we have reckoned up) but beside the rest he put on a Hyacinthine coloured coat, extending in length to his hammes (which our countrey call Methir) this girdeth he unto him with a girdle of divers colours (not unlike the former) but that it is ſtudded with gold: but the skirt of the veſture is bordered with fringes, ſowed together, to which are tied certain counterfeit Pomegranates, with certain golden bels, properly diſpoſed; ſo that between two Pomegranates, there is placed a bel, and between two bels one Pomegranate. This coat is not made of two pieces (as having ſeams on the ſhoulders, and on the ſides) but a long vail woven and left open in the choller, not athwart, but long-waies, from the breaſt to the middeſt of the back. To it is a riband or hemme faſtned, leſt the opening ſhould be perceived: it is likewiſe open in that place where the hands ſhould be put out. Beſides theſe veſtures, he hath a third called an Ephod (reſembling a Grecian frock, that is made after this manner.) It is woven of divers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midſt of the breaſt there is a ſpace left open (the ſleeves are made in ſuch manner, & all the reſt in ſuch ſort compoſed, that it ſeemeth to be a coat; in this void ſpace there is a piece enchaſed of the bignes of a ſpan long, embroydred with the ſame colours, gold, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Eſſen, that is as much to ſay, a Rationall (which wholly filleth the ſpace that was left void by them that have woven the Ephod.) And this peice is joyned with the Ephod, and to every corner thereof with buckels of gold, which are tied with a lace of Hyacinth applied to tie them together with theſe buckles. And to the end the ſpace between the buckles be not ſlack, they filled the ſuture with a Hyacinthine thread: but on either ſhoulder two Sardonix ſtones enchaſed in gold (in ſtead of buttons) do tie the hood or Ephod; in theſe are ingraven the names of Jacobs ſons in Hebrew Characters, in either ſtone ſixe: ſo that the elder of them were placed on the right ſhoulder. Moreover twelve precious ſtones diſtinguiſh the Eſſen or Rationall it ſelf, of excellent greatneſſe and beauty, which for their ineſtimable price could not be bought by any private man. They were inchaſed three and three in four ranks in certain crowns of gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the firſt order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the ſecond a Carbuncle, a Iaſpis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurius, an Amethiſt and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chryſolite, an Onyx, and a Berill ſtone. In theſe were the names of Jacobs ſons engraven, whom we eſteem for the firſt authors of our Tribes (every ſtone being honoured with a ſeverall name, according to the order of their birth. But whereas theſe rings (whereof before we have ſpoken) are weake, and cannot ſuſtaine the weight of the precious ſtones, they made two greater in the top of the Rationall inclining toward the neckward, being eminent above the texture, which might receive the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the ſhoulders to be faſtned with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked and conveighed certain pipes, put thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brimme behinde the Ephod, to faſten the Rationall, to the end it ſhould neither ſway this waies nor that waies. To the ſame Rationall alſo was there a girdle ſewed, diſtinguiſhed with the ſaid colours and gold; which comprehending the whole; and again knit upon the ſeame, was ſuffered to hang downwards. And as touching the fringes, they were ſhut in hollow loops of gold from the one end to the other. Now his hat was ſuch as the other Prieſts uſed, on which there ſtood an other ſewed thereto, and flouriſhed with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was invironed with a golden crown, in which there were divers veſſels of gold made after ſuch a ſort as may be ſeen in that herb which we call Daccharus, and among the Grecian herbaliſts, Henbane. And leſt any man that hath heretofore ſeene the ſame, ſhould be ignoranr of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the ſame, hath not ſeen the herbe it ſelf: I have thought good to ſet down the deſcription thereof in this place. This herbe is of the hight of three ſpans, it hath a root like a Turnep or Navew (and he ſhall not erre, that in regard thereof ſhall compair it therewith) it hath leaves that reſemble Smallage or Rocquet: this out of the ſtem thereof yeeldeth forth a certain bud cleaving to the branches of it, inveſted with a coat, which it caſteth off when the fruit waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the joynt of a little finger, having a circumference like unto a cup; which I will deſcribe more fitly once again, that the ignorant may the better diſcover it. In the lower part thereof about the bottome it reſembleth in roundneſſe a halfe bowle: and according as it groweth every part thereof is ſtreightned, untill being again dilated in the extremity or brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much unlike to a Pomegranate cut in the middeſt, to which there is annexed and groweth a round cover as if turned and framed on purpoſe, having theſe eminent clefts (as I ſaid) like to the middeſt of a Pomegranate, reſembling the pointed and ſharp thorns, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certain fruit under the cover, and in the whole Cup is like to the ſeed of the herb Sideritis, his flower is not much unlike that which ſpringeth from the Poppey. Such was this crowne about

about the neck, and the two Temples, for theſe cups came not neere the front or brow. For on the ſame there was as it were a Bend of Gold, on which the name of God was engraven. Such were the ornaments of the high Prieſt.

I cannot therfore but greatly wonder at the ſtrange and cauſeleſſe malice, which other Nations have conceived againſt us, as if we were injurious againſt the divine Majeſty, which (they ſay) they ſo much honour. For, if a man mark the compoſition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the high Prieſt, and conſider all the neceſſaries which we uſe in celebrating the divine Service, they ſhall finde, that our Law-maker was a man of a divine ſpirit, and that we without any deſert are injured by other Nations. For, if without partialitie a man will duely examine it, he ſhall finde, that all things have beene done to repreſent and figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrificers, as a place prophaned, and common, ſignifying the Land and Sea, wherein in all ſorts of creatures are converſant: but the third part is ſequeſtred, and reſerved for God alone; in like ſort, as the Heaven is unacceſſible by men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves were placed, ſignifieth the year divided into twelve moneths. The Candleſticke, made of ſeventie pieces, ſignifieth the twelve Signes, thorow which every one of the ſeven Planets paſſe: the ſeven Lampes that were therein, repreſented the ſeven Planets. The Veyles, made of foure ſeverall kindes of ſtuffes, reſembled the foure Elements: for the Linnen ſeemed to repreſent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple reſembled the Sea, becauſe the Purple colour is made of the bloud of a ſhell-fiſh, called Murex: the Hyacinth ſignifieth the Ayre: and as touching the Scarlet, it ſignifieth the Fire. The Tunicle likewiſe of the high Prieſt demonſtrateth the Earth, for it is made of Linnen. The Hyacinth ſheweth the Pole: the Pomegranats reſembled the Lightning, as the Bells the noyſe of the Thunder. The Sircot ſheweth, that the whole World is compaſſed of foure Elements, reſembled in his foure colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things, Eſſen alſo is planted in the middle thereof, in ſuch ſort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewiſe, the Girdle wherewith he is girt, reſembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix ſtones (ſet as Buttons or Loopes in the high Prieſts Garment) ſignifie the Sunne and Moone. The number of the Gems are alluded to the number of the Moneths, or the twelve Houſes, or the equall number of the parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiack (he ſhall not much erre, that followeth either the one or the other of theſe opinions.) The Kup likewiſe hath an alluſion to Heaven, by reaſon of his Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwiſe the Name of God might be placed therein: for it was beautified with a Crown of Gold, to ſignifie the Light, wherein God highly delighteth. Let this ſuffice for the preſent: for that which we ſhall diſcourſe hereafter, will furniſh us with ſufficient and ample matter, to ſhew and ſet out the vertue of our Law-maker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Prieſthood, and the Lawes which appertaine to the Feaſts and Sacrifices.

AFTER theſe things above ſaid were finiſhed, and left as yet unconſecrated, God appeared unto Moſes, commanding him to eſtabliſh Aaron, his brother, in the Prieſthood (who, in reſpect of his vertue, deſerved that title of honour above all the reſt.) For which cauſe, Moſes (aſſembling the congregation) diſcourſed unto them his vertues, and diſcovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had ſuffered in their behalfe, whereof each of them gave ample teſtimonie, declaring the forward zeale and love they alwayes bare unto him) whereupon he ſpake unto them after this manner: The work is now brought to ſuch an end as it hath pleaſed God, and hath been poſſible for us: and for that you know we are to receive him into this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have an eſpeciall care in the election of ſuch a one, who ſhall make ſacrifice and ſupplication for us. Touching my ſelfe, if the matter depended on my private choyce, I ſhould eſteeme no man more worthy then my ſelfe to execute this Function, both for that naturally men love themſelves, and for that I am well aſſured, how many travels I have ſupported for your ſafetie ſake. But God himſelfe hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath choſen him for his high Prieſt and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of us in equitie and juſtice; commanding, that he ſhould be inveſted with the Robe conſecrated to God, and that he ſhould take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He ſhall make prayers for you unto God; who will heare them willingly, ly by reason that he hath care of your race, and will receive them, proceeding from a personage whom he himselfe hath elected. These words of his were gratefull unto the people, and they all of them approved the election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour then any other, both by reason of his race, as also in regard of the prophecying spirit and vertue of his brother. He had at that time foure sonns, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatsoever remained of those things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was imployed to make Vayles to cover the Tabernacle, candlestick, Altar, and the other Instruments, to the end, that in their travell they should not be soyled either by raine or dust. And having once more assembled the people together, he commanded them to offer every one of them halfe a Sicle; (now the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew Coyne, that is as much in value as foure Athenian Drammes) whereunto they obeyed willingly: so that the number of them that offered, was sixe times one hundreth thousand five hundreth and fiftie. And they that brought this Money, were such as were of a free condition, and betwixt the yeares of twenty and fiftie; and that which was received, was imployed in the necessaries of the Temple. Then did he purifie the Tabernacle, and the Priests in manner and forme following. He took the weight of five hundreth Sicles of chosen Myrrh, and the like quantitie of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a most odoriferous Drug) the halfe of the said weight; and he caused all these to be beaten and infused into a Hin of Oyle of Olive, others write, palme; this Hin is one of our Measures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed and boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a most odoriferous Oyntment; which he took, and anoynted the Priest withall, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them: offering many and sundry sorts of beasts, of great price, to sacrifice within the Temple, upon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbeare to speak any further, for feare I should grow offensive and tedious to the Readers.) Twice a day, before the Sunne-rise, and Sunne-set, they were to burne Incense, and purifie the Oyle, and refresh the Lampes; whereof, three ought to burn every day upon the sacred Candlestick, in honour of God, and the rest were lighted in the evening. Amongst them that wrought and finished these things, Beseleel and Eliab were the most excellent and experteſt workmen, for whatsoever had beene enterprized by others, they in their Art polished and perfected. And they of themselves found many new things, of their owne invention: yet was Beseleel judged the most excellent of them two.

Vers. Beseleel.

All the time imployed in this work, was seven moneths; and at that time was the year accomplished, which began at their departure out of Egypt. In the beginning of the second yeare, in the moneth which the Macedonians call Xanticus, and the Hebrews Nisan, upon the new Moone; they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereunto, according as I have made mention. And God presently testified, that both their Gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrews labours fruitfull and pleasant in his sight; testifying his presence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the Heaven was otherwayes cleare and faire, over the Tabernacle onely there was a Cloud; not wholly thick, like a Winter storme, nor obscure; and yet not so thinne, as a man could see thorow the same; from whence there descended a Dewe, that gave testimony of Gods presence unto them that had will, and beleef. Moses honoured the Work-masters that made the Work, with such rewards as appertained unto them by desert; and sacrificed according as God had commanded him, in the Doore or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, and a Ram, and a Kid for their sinnes, but with what ceremonie these things are done, I will declare, when I entreat of Sacrifices, as also what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed upon) and with the bloud of the slaughtred beasts he besprinkled the Vestment of Aaron, and purified both him and his children with fountaine water and the precious Oyntment, to the end they might be sanctified to God. And for seven dayes space he consecrated both themselves, and their Vestments, and the Tabernacle, with those things which appertained thereunto, with that Oyle whereof I have before time fore-told you, with the bloud of Bulls and Rams slain every other day, after their kinde. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a holy-day and festivall to all the people, and decreed, that every one of them should particularly sacrifice according to his abilitie; and they with emulation (striving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered up their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

Levit 9.24. The sacrifice is consumed of it selfe.

A venience to Aaron, which although it somewhat moved and amated his fatherly patience, yet digested he it with a constant and generous minde: for he was a man of much constancie, and such a one as knew, that nothing could befall him without the prescience and providence of God. For of those four sonnes (which I told you that he had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing sacrifices unto the altar (not such as were appointed by Moses, but of that sort they were accustomed to offer before times) were burned by the violent flame that issued from the altar, seizng both their breasts and faces, in such a sort, as by no means possible that might be extinguished; so that at length they died. Moses commanded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the host, and bury them sumptuously: all the people wept, and were amazed very much at this their death, so strange and unexpected. But Moses ordained that neither the father, nor his sons
B should lament; but that they should rather make estimate of Gods honour, then of their own mistortune: for Aaron was already invested in the sacred robe. But as touching Moses, he refused all honours which were offered him by the people, neither applied he himselt unto any other thing but to the service of God: neither did he ascend any more up to the mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle to take counsell at Gods hands in those things, whereof he had need to be informed. He demeaned himself like a private man, not onely in his apparell, but in all other things, and lived very popularly, persevering in that familiar and civill course of life, and challenging no priviledge above any man, but onely in those things which pertained to the administration of the common-weale.

Besides these, he reduced under writing both the laws and ordinances as touching poli-
C cie, in due performance whereof if they should live, they should be both agreable to God, and live without cause of controversie the one against the other. And all this established he, following those directions, which God instructed him in. But now will I return and bend my stile to discourse upon that which I have omitted in the ornament of the high Priest for this apparell of theirs leaveth not any occasion to false Prophets, to execute their wicked impostures: and if there be any such, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods Majestie, this habit maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to be present with the sacrificers, at such time as it pleaseth him; and to be absent when him listeth: which God would have made known not onely to the Hebrews, but to all those strangers, who by any occurrence might be eye-witnesses of the same. For of those stones which the high Priest bare on his shoulders (which were Sardonixes, whose nature is so notorious to all men, D that it were unnecessarie to reveal it) the one shined at such time as there was any offering, and that other which was fastned on his right shoulder, shined very cleerly at such time as God was present at the sacrifice, and cast his raies a farre off, that it might be perceived by those that beheld the same, both contrary to his nature and custome: which truly deserveth admiration amongst all men, except those who through contempt of Religion, do hunt after an opinion of wisedome. But that which I will now speak of, is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelve stones which the high Priest bare (sewed and enchased in his Rationall in the midst of his brest) God was wont to fore-signifie victorie to those that were addressed to battell. For such brightnesse lightned out of them, even before such time as the army did dislodge or enter skirmish, that it was notoriously known to the peo-
E ple, that God was present and ready to assist them: for which cause the Greeks making account of our manner of living, in that they had no power or reason to contradict it, have called that Rationall which we terme Essen (moved thereunto by this expresse miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rationall and the stone Sardonix gave over to shine two hundred yeers before I began to write these Antiquities, by reason of Gods wrath which he had conceived through the breach of his laws (of which at another time I will more fitly intreat, and at this time continue and prosecute my intended discourse and purpose. After the Tabernacle had been thus consecrated, and that which appertained to the Priests was set in order, the people was perswaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and began to sacrifice and sing hymnes of praises, as to him that had driven farre from them all suspition of evill, and from whom they expected in time to come farre better and F more prosperous things; and both in generall and in particular they offered gifts unto God according to their tribes: for the governours of the tribes (assembling themselves together two by two) prepared a chariot and a yoke of oxen, so that there were six chariots to bear the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore, every one of them offered a viall and a censer, and a cofer to keep incense in, which was esteemed to be worth ten dariques, and this was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the censer was of silver, and both of them toge-

They offered likewiſe a calf, and a ramme, with a lambe of one yeer old, for a burnt-ſacrifice; and a goat for a ſinne-offering. All the other governors likewiſe brought every one of them their ſacrifice called Salutarie, for every day two oxen and five rammes, with a lambe and a goat of a yeer old, and ſacrificed them during the terme of twelve dayes every one. But Moſes aſcended no more to the mountain of Sinay, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was inſtructed by God of that which he had to do, and what laws he ought to make, which are ſo good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wiſedome: They have been faithfully obſerved likewiſe alwayes, becauſe they are ſuppoſed to be received from God. So that not any one H

CHAP. X.

Hedio & Rufinus chap 13. all. 12. NOw will I onely reckon up a few things as touching the purifications and ſacrifices (in that we have begun to talk of ſacrifices.) The ſacrifices are of two ſorts: the one of them is made for a private perſon; the other for the people in gene- I

Holocautoma, *Lev.*1.2.ad 10. the Altar, which for that cauſe are called Holocanſts, that is to ſay, Burned. The other are of thankſgiving, and they are made with banquets of thoſe that ſacrifice. But firſt of all I will ſpeak of the firſt kinde. The particular perſon that offered a burnt-offering, killed an Ox, a lambe, and a goat of one yeer old, (yet is it lawfull to kill oxen more elder.) But all thoſe creatures which muſt be conſumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Prieſts beſprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dreſſe they the beaſt, and cut it in pieces, and powder it with ſalt, and lay it on the Altar already charged with cleft wood, and flaming fire: then after they have well cleanſed the feet and intrails, they lay them with the reſt; and the the Prieſts take the skinnes. K
A ſacrifice of thankſgiving. *Levit.*4.5. Such is the manner of a burnt-offering or Holocauſt. They that offer ſacrifices of thankſgiving, kill likewiſe ſuch ſorts of beaſt without ſpot, and more then a yeer old, both male and female: and after they have cut their throats, they ſprinkle the blood on the Altar: then take they the reins, the caul, and all the fat; with the lobe of the liver, and the tail of the mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the breſt, and the left legge is left to the Prieſts: and as touching the reſt of the fleſh, the Prieſts banquet therewith for the ſpace of two dayes; and if then there remain any thing thereof, it is burned. The ſame cuſtome and ceremonie likewiſe is obſerved in the ſacrifice for ſinnes: but thoſe that are not of ability to offer the L greater offerings, offer up two pigeons, or two turtles; the one of which the Prieſts have to feaſt withall, and the other is conſumed with fire. We will intreat more expreſly of the ſacrifices of ſuch beaſts, at ſuch time as we ſhall diſcourſe upon ſacrifices. For he that hath
The ſacrifice for ſinne ſinned upon ignorance, offereth a lambe, and a ſhe goat at the ſame time. The Prieſt beſpinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in ſuch manner as it is ſaid heretofore, but the horns of the Altar onely: and on the Altar they offer the kidneyes, and the reſt of the fat, with the lobe of the liver: the Prieſts carry away the skinnes, and eat the fleſh within the Temple the very ſame day; becauſe the law permitteth them not to reſerve any thing

The law alſo ordaineth, that in ſacrifices both private and common, there ſhould be fine flower brought, for a lambe, the meaſure of an Aſſer; for a ramme, the meaſure of two; with a bull, three; which flower is firſt of all mingled and wrought with oyl, and ſet upon the Altar to be ſanctified. They that ſacrifice likewiſe do bring oyl, the half part of a Hin for a bull; for a ramme, the third of the ſame meaſure; and for a lambe, the fourth part: this Hin is an Hebrew meaſure, which containeth two Attique Choas: they brought alſo the like meaſure of wine as of oyl, and powred out the wine neer

A to the Altar. And if any without ſacrificing offer up fine flower, he putteth the firſt fruits upon the Altar, that is to ſay, one handful and the reſt is taken by the Prieſts for their maintenance, either fried (for they are kneaded in oyl) or with loaves made thereof: but whatſoever the Prieſt offereth, all that muſt be burned. The law likewiſe forbiddeth to offer any beaſt whatſoever, that day that it is born, or to kill it with his dam, or in any other ſort, before it hath fed twelve daies. There are alſo other ſacrifices made for deliverance from ſickneſſe or for other cauſes; in which ſacrifice, they imploy wine or liquor with that which is offered; of which liquors, it is not lawful to reſerve any thing againſt the next morrow, when the Prieſts have taken that portion which belongeth to and ſufficeth them. The law commandeth, that on the common purſe there be every day killed a lamb of a yeer

B old, the one in the morning, the other at the ſhutting up of the evening: and on the ſeventh day, which is called the Sabbath, that two ſhould be offered in that manner as hath been declared. And on the new moon, beſides their daily offrings, they ſacrifice two oxen, ſeven yeerling lambs, and a wether and a kid, for the abolition of thoſe ſins which are committed through forgetfulneſſe. On the ſeventh moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) beſides the above-named, they ſacrifice a bull, one mutton, ſeven lambs, and a kid for ſinnes. The tenth day of the ſame moneth, according to the moon, they faſt till the evening; and on the ſame day they ſacrifice, a bull, two muttons, ſeven lambs, and a goat, for a ſin-offering; beſides which, they bring two kids, one of which is ſent alive, out of the limits of the camp into the deſart (on whom all the evill may fall, if ſo be any be threatned to the people) the other is born without the camp, into a clean place, where it is burned

C with the skin, being not any wayes purged. With this they burn a bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but by the proper coſts of the prieſt. This bull being opened and ſlain, and the blood thereof (with that of the goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he ſprinkleth the cover thereof with his finger ſeven times, and the pavement as many times, and the Tabernacle and the Altar of gold, and all the reſt about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. Beſides that, they ſet on the Altar the reins, and the fat with the lobe of the liver, and the prieſt offereth unto God a mutton for a burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the ſaid moneth (at ſuch time as it draweth towards winter) he commanded them to plant tabernacles every one in his family, againſt the inſtant cold weather which the encreaſing yeer was wont to bring; and that when they ſhould injoy their countrey, and

D ſhould enter that citie which they ſhould hold for their Metropolitane, (by reaſon of the Temple which ſhould be there builded) they might celebrate a feaſt during eight daies ſpace, in offering burnt-offering and ſacrifices unto God: and that in witneſſe of their thanksgiving, they ſhould bear in their hands a branch of mirtle and of willow, tied together with wooll, and a bough of palm likewiſe, to which a peach was faſtned; and that the firſt day they ſhould ſacrifice thirteen oxen, and fourteen lambs, and two ſheep, with a goat, for a ſin-offering. Thoſe daies that enſued, they ſacrificed likewiſe a like number of lambs, and wethers, with a kid; and in rebating day by day the number of oxen, they come back to the ſeventh. The eight day they ceaſe from work. On this day (as we have ſaid) they ſa-

E crifice a calf, a ramme, and ſeven lambs, and a kid, for a ſinne-offering: and it is the cuſtome of the Hebrews to perform theſe ſacrifices at ſuch time as they pitcht their tabernacles. In the moneth Xantique (which we called Niſan) which is the firſt moneth of the yeer, the fourteenth day after the new moon, the ſunne being in Aries, (for at that time were we delivered out of Ægypt) he ordained, that every yeer we ſhould do ſacrifice, which we call the Paſſeover, which (as I ſaid) was celebrated the ſame time that we departed out of Ægypt. This ſolemnitie of Eaſter we celebrate by companies, without reſerving any thing of that which is offered, till the next day. The fifteenth day the feaſt of unleavened bread followeth the ſolemnitie of the Paſſeover; and during thoſe ſeven dayes, it is unlawfull to eat any unleavened bread: and every day are ſlain two buls, one ramme, and ſeven lambs, which are all conſumed with fire; to which there is added a kid, for a ſinne-offering for a ſeverall dayes banquet to feaſt the Prieſts with. The ſecond day of this feaſt of unleavened bread

F (which is the ſixteenth of the moneth) they begin to enjoy the fruits that are moved; and before that time untouched. And for that it is very convenient, that God ſhould be honoured with the firſt fruits thereof, from whom they receive ſuch abundance, they offer the firſt fruits of barley after this manner: After they have dried a handful of the ears, they beat or threſh it, and cleanſe the barley from the chaffe, and offer an Aſſer of the ſame upon the Altar unto God; and after they have caſt a handfull of the ſame on the Altar, they leave the reſt for the Preiſts uſe: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reap as well in publike publick as in particular. With these first fruites, they sacrifice unto God a lamb, for a burnt- G offering. Seven weeks after the feast of the passeover (that is fourty nine daies) on the fiftieth (which the Hebrews, by reason of the number, call Asartha) they offer unto God a leavened bread, made of wheat flower, of the quantity of two Assars, and sacrifice two lambs, which are onely offered up to God, and afterwards are prepared for the Priests dinner, and it is not lawful for them to reserve any thing thereof until the next day. But the burntofferings are, of three calves, two wethers, and fourteen lambs; besides two kids, for a sin-offering. There is not any feast wherein they offer not a burnt-offering, and desist not from all manual labour: but in every one of the same, there is ordained a certain sort of sacrifice which they ought to do: and it is presently ordered, that they rest from their labours, and H after sacrifice, fall to banquet. On the common charge they offered unleavened bread, of twenty four Assars of flower: and those loaves they baked two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the morning they bring it, and set it on the sacred Table, opposing six to six, the one against the other; and upon them are imposed two platters full of incense: and these things remain after this manner till the next Sabbath, and then set they new in the place of the first, which are given to the Priests for their maintenance. Levit. 8. Numb. 3. The incense is cast into the sacred fire, in which the burnt-offerings are consumed, and in place thereof there is new incense put. The tribe of Levi sacred to God. Levit. 8. per totum.

Moses separated the tribe of Levi, and exempted them from the other people, to the end they might be consecrated unto God: and he purified them with living fountain-water, and purged them with solemne sacrifice, and committed the Tabernacle to their charge, with all the holy things pertaining thereunto, and all the rest which had been made for the cover of the Tabernacle, to the end they might be ministers unto the Priests, their superiours, who were already consecrated unto God. After this he distinguished the beastsalso; namly, those that were to be eaten, from those that were to be forborn and abstained from, (of which we will speak, at [illegible] time as occasion is offered us; and will bring proofs, and the reason which induced him to ordain, that some were proper to feed upon, and for what cause he would that we should abstain from othersome.) He hath generally interdicted all use of blood K in meats, esteeming the blood to be the soul and spirit of beasts. He hath also generally prohibited to eat the flesh of those beasts that died by themselves; likewise the caul and fat of goats, of sheep, and oxen. He thrust them likewise out of the company and conversation of men, who were leprous, and such as were troubled with the flux of their seed. And as touching women that have sickneſſe, he sequestred them for the space of seven daies, after which, it was lawful for them to converse indifferently the one with the other The like decreed he of those that had assisted the buriall of a dead man, whom he permitted to converse with the other, after seven daies were expired. It was a thing also decreed by law, that he that was surprised with uncleaneſſe, and unpurified beyound the number of those daies, he should sacrifice two Wethers, one which should be purified, and the other given to the Priests. The like sacrifice is made for him that hath had unnaturall pollution, who L first washeth himself in cold water. The like must they offer, that have use of their lawfull wives. He altogether drove the Leprous out of the citie, not permitting them to frequent any mans company, but esteeming them as men little differing from the dead. And if any one by his praiers made unto God, was delivered from this disease, and his skin reduced to his native colour, such a one presented himself before God in divers oblations and sacrifices; of which, we will speak hereafter, for which cause they are worthy to be laughed at, who say, that Moses fled out of Egypt, because he was a Leper, and that he conducted with him other such as were travelled with that disease, and brought them into the land of Canaan. For, if that were true, Moses had not made these ordinances, to his own prejudice: which if other had proposed, it behoved him to have opposed himself against them; especi- M ally, since among other divers Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are so farre from disdain and contempt, as that they have been made Generals of most notable Armeis, and elected for Governours of common-weals, having liberty to enter the Temples. and to be present at the sacrifices. What therefore hindred Moses (if he had been polluted with the like hatefull sickneſſe) to make such laws, and ordaine such statutes among those people, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby such as were there-

But Moſes being clean from ſuch ſickneſſe, and converſing amongſt his countreymen which were untainted, made theſe ordinances for them that were ſick, having regard to the honour of God. But of theſe things let each man cenſure as beſt liketh him.

He forbade that women ſhould enter into the Temple after their deliverance, or to aſſiſt the ſacrifice, untill fourty dayes were expired (if they had been brought a-bed of a ſonne) but if it were a daughter, he willed that the number of the dayes ſhould be doubled; and that when they ſhould enter, they ſhould preſent their offerings unto God, and to the Prieſts that offered them. And if any one ſuſpected that his wife had committed adultery; he
B brought an Aſſar of grinded barley, and caſt a handful thereof before God, and the reſt was reſerved for the maintenance of the Prieſts; and then the Prieſt placing the woman in the porch which is right over againſt the Temple, and taking the cover from her head, writeth the name of God upon a skinne, and maketh her ſwear that ſhe hath not plaied falſe with her husband; and wiſh if ſhe had tranſgreſſed the bounds of chaſtity, that her right thigh might be put out of joynt, her womb might rot, and that death might follow thereupon: but if (through entire love, and jealouſie proceeding therefro) her husband had been inconſiderately drawn into that ſuſpition, that ſhe might within ten moneths bring forth a male child. And after ſuch an oath miniſtred unto her, the Prieſt wipeth out the name of God that was written on the skin, and wringeth it into a vial; and then taking off the earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and having mingled the ſame, giveth it to the C woman to drink; and if ſhe had been unjuſtly accuſed, ſhe continueth with child, and beareth her fruit her full time: but if ſhe hath falſified her faith to her husband, and forſworn her ſelf before God, then dieth ſhe a ſhamefull death, for her thigh is nummed, and her wombe grows full of water. See here how Moſes hath provided for theſe ſacrifices at the purifying of a woman, He furthermore made theſe lawes which enſue. He generally forbad adultery, judging it to be a great good hap, if men demeaned themſelves honeſtly in marriage: and that both in politiqüe eſtates, and private families, it was a thing moſt profitable, that children ſhould be born in lawful matrimony.

Exod 22. Deut. 17. Levit. 18. 20, 21 29.

The law alſo forbiddeth a man to have the uſe of his mother (for that it is a thing moſt
D abominable) and likewiſe prohibiteth him to keep unlawful company with his fathers wife, his aunt, and his ſiſter, or his ſonnes wife: and deteſteth it as a moſt hainous and hideous offence. It prohibiteth alſo the uſe of a woman when ſhe hath her monethly ſickneſſe; the uſe of beaſts alſo eſpecially the male, by reaſon that ſuch affections are abominable: and againſt the tranſgreſſours of theſe laws he eſtabliſhed moſt ſtrict and mortal puniſhments. He willed alſo that the Prieſts ſhould be twice more chaſte then the reſt, for he not onely forbade them that which he prohibited others; but moreover he enjoyned them not to marry thoſe that had been abandoned, or ſlaves, or priſoners, or victuallers and taverners, forſaken by their husbands for any occaſion whatſoever. And as touching the high Prieſt, he permitted
E him not to match with the widow of him that was dead (although it were made lawful for the other Prieſts) and granted him onely liberty to take a virgin to his wife, and to keep her. The ſaid high Prieſt is alſo forbidden to approach a dead man (although the other Prieſts are not ſcanted of that liberty to approach their brothers, fathers and mothers, and children deceaſed.) Willing that they ſhould be ſimple in all kind of ſimplicity.

Lev. 21. 7, 8, 9.

What wife the high Prieſt might marry with.

He likewiſe ordained, that the Prieſt which ſhould not be found in body, ſhould be maintained by the other Prieſts, but in the mean time that he ſhould not approach the Altar, neither enter into the Temple: willing that not onely they ſhould be neat in that which concerned the divine ſervice, but alſo that they ſhould ſtudy and endeavour to be the like in all the actions of their life, to the end that no man might reprove them. For which cauſe
F they that bear the habit of the Prieſts are unreproveable, and in all things pure and ſober, being forbidden to drink wine as long as they ware the prieſtly veſture. They were willed alſo to offer up entire ſacrifices, and no waies maimed. Theſe ſtatutes did Moſes decree, and make during his life time. And afterwards he deviſed others alſo, at ſuch time as he remained in the deſart; which both the people might practiſe in that place; and then alſo when they had poſſeſſed the land of Canaan. He gave reſt unto the earth the ſeventh year; ſo that it was neither tilled nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to reſt from their labours on the ſeventh day of the week) and he ordained, that the fruits which the earth of it ſelf brought forth, ſhould be common to all thoſe that would make uſe thereof, as well to thoſe of the countrey, as ſtrangers, without any forbidding or reſervation. He likewiſe decreed decreed that this ſhould be done after the ſeventh week of yeers, which containeth the G ſpace of fiftie years, which the Hebrews call Jubile, in which the debtors are acquitted by their creditors, and the bond-men made free, who being of the people (and for that they had forfeited againſt ſome one law) had been puniſhed, being handled after the manner of ſlaves, and not put to death; and to thoſe, who from the beginning had been poſſeſſours of lands, they were reſtored unto them in this manner following. The Jubile being at hand (which word ſignifieth libertie) both he that ſold, and he that bought the land met together and caſt up the account of the profits and expences that have been reaped and beſtowed on the land: and if it be found that the profits do amount, he that ſold the land repoſſeſſeth it: but if the charges exceed the value of the profits, he reſtoreth the ſurpluſage to the buyer that is due unto him, and retaineth the land to himſelf. And if the profits and ex- H pences are anſwerable the one unto the other, the reſtitution is made to him that had the ancient inheritance. He ratified likewiſe the ſame law in houſes that were bought in villages or cities. For if he that ſold, counted down the money he had received before the year were finiſhed; he compelled the purchaſer to reſtore him his houſe: and if he ſtayed till the year were fully finiſhed, the poſſeſſion and free purchaſe remained unto him that bought it. Moſes received this diſpoſition of his laws from God, at ſuch time as his flocks fed at the foot of the mountain of Sinai, and he gave them in writing to the Hebrews.

The Lawes and cuſtomes of Warre.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 15. all. 12. Numb. 1,2,3.

AFter that theſe laws had been after this manner digeſted, Moſes addreſſed himſelf to the affairs and laws of warre (fore-thinking him of thoſe battels which ſhould follow.) He therefore commanded the Governours of the tribes (the tribe of Levi onely excepted) to take a preciſe view and muſters of thoſe men that were capable and able to bear arms (for the Levites were ſacred and exempt from thoſe functions) and the ſearch being made, there were found ſix hundreth and three thouſand, ſix hundreth and fifty fighting men, betwixt the years of twenty, and fifty. But in ſtead of Levi he choſe Manaſſes, the ſon of Joſeph, and Ephraim for his father Joſeph: for ſo much had Jacob entreated at Joſephs K hands, that he would give him his ſonnes, that he might adopt them (as it hath been aforetime declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midſt of the camp, guarded and defenced with the tribes which were incamped three by three on every ſide. There were certain waies or paths likewiſe laid out between them, and a market place was quartered out, and ſhops for all ſorts of merchandiſe diſpoſed by order, and workmen and artizans of all occupations, travelling in their ſhops; ſo that to look upon it, it reſembled a city that marched and encamped.

The diſpoſition of the army.

The Prieſts firſt were planted next unto the Tabernacle, and after them followed all the community of the Levites (for there was a view alſo made of them accounting all the males exceeding the age of thirtie dayes; and they were counted to be twentie and three L thouſand, eight hundreth and eightie.) And when it chanced that a cloud deſcended upon the Tabernacle, then reſted they, as if God thought good to reſt in that place; and if it departed from the ſame, then removed they likewiſe. He invented alſo a certain kind of Cornet made of ſilver, and framed after this manner. In length it was almoſt a cubit, and it was like the narrow whiſtle of a Fife, but a little more thicker, yet nevertheleſſe, it was wide enough for the ſpace of the mouth, to the end to receive the breath, and the end thereof was made like a little Bell, in form of a trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew tongue a Aſofra. There were two of them, whereof the one of them ſerved to aſſemble and call the people to publick aſſemblies; and the other to convocate the Governours when they were to conſult upon affairs of eſtate; and if both of them were ſounded, then all of them in generall M gathered together. When the Tabernacle was removed, this manner was obſerved; As ſoon as the firſt charge was ſounded, they that were incamped toward the Eaſt, firſt of all diſlodged: at the ſecond charge, they to the Southward diſincamped; then was the Tabernacle unpitched, and caried in the midſt, ſix of the tribes marching before, and ſix of them after: the Levites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they ſounded the third time, the quarter toward the Weſt-ward removed: and the fourth was that to the Northward. They made uſe alſo of all theſe Cornets in the divine ſervice, with which they ordered the ſacrifices on the Sabbath and other daies. Then alſo was the firſt paſſeover celebrated with ſolemn offerings after their departure out of Egypt, they being in the deſart.

Sedition against Moses, through the scarcitie of victuals: and the punishment of the Rebellious.

NOt long after this, they removed their camp from the mountain of Sinai: and after certain encampings (of which we will speak) they came to a place which is called Iseremoth: where the people once more began to ruminate and revive their Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage upon Moses; objecting, that by his perswasion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not onely that they were destitute of the plentie thereof, but also in stead of hoped felicitie, forced to wander here and there in extreme miserie, and travelled with want of water: and that if Manna likewise should in any sort fail them, they were like all of them, without question, to perish for want of sustenance. Hereunto annexed they divers contumelies, which were every where inflicted against him, being a man of so great desert and consequence. Mean while there arose one amongst the people, who (admonishing them of the fore-passed benefits received by the hands of Moses) counselled them to be of good courage; assuring them, that at that time they should not be frustrate either of that hope, or help, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incensed against him by these words, and more and more whetted their spleens against the Prophet: Who seeing them so desperate, willed them to be of a good courage; promising them, that although by injurious speeches he had undeservedly been offenced by them, yet that he would give them store of flesh, not for one day onely, but also for many. But they being incredulous, (and some one amongst them demanding, how he could make provision for so many thousand men) God (saith he) and I, although we be evill spoken of by you, yet will we never desist to be carefull for you, and that shall you shortly perceive. Scarce had he spoken this, but that all the Camp was filled with Quails, which they hunted for by heaps. Yet God, not long after that, punished the insolencie and slander of the Hebrews, by the death of no small number: for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cause was imposed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba; as if you should say, The Monuments of Concupiscence.

Of the Spies that were sent to search the Land of Canaan: and how returning to the Israelites, they amased them with fear.

BUt after that Moses had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a countrey not so apt for habitation, (not farre from the borders of the Canaanites, which is called the Jaws (he called the people to a Councell, and standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this manner: God (saith he) having decreed to grant you two great benefits, namely, the libertie and possession of a happy countrey, hath granted you alreadie the possession of the one, and will shortly make you partakers of the other, For we are upon the borders of Canaan; from whence both the Cities and Kings are so farre from driving us, as the whole Nation being united together, is not of power to expell us. Let us therfore addresse our selves very confidently to attempt the matter: for neither without fight, will they resigne the title of their countrey unto us; neither without great conflicts, may we obtain the Palm of Victorie. Let us therefore send out certain Spies, to search into the secrets of the Countrey, and such as may conjecture how great their power is: but above all things, let us be at unitie one with another; and let us honour God, who assisteth us in all dangers, and fighteth for us. After that Moses had spoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counsels) chose twelve out of the most noblest families of the Tribes, to go and search the Countrey, out of every Tribe one: Who beginning from the parts extending towards Ægypt, visited all the countrey of the Canaanites, untill they came to the citie of Amathe, and the mountain of Libanus. And having searched out both the Land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home again, having consumed fourty dayes in those affairs. Moreover they brought with them such fruits as the Countrey yeelded; and by the beautie thereof, and by the quantitie of those riches, (which they reported to be in that Countrey) they incouraged the hearts of the people to fight valiantly: but on the other side, they dismayed them with the difficultie of the conquest, saying, that there were certain Rivers impossible to be overpassed, both for their greatneſſe and depth; that there were therein alſo inacceſſible mountains and cities, fortified both with walls and bulwarks. Moreover they told them, that in Hebron they found a race of Gyants. And thus theſe ſpies (when as they had found all things farre greater amongſt the Canaanites, then to that day they had ſeen ſince their departure out of Egypt) they of ſet purpoſe, by their fear, brought the reſt of the multitude into a dangerous ſuſpition and perplexity: who conjecturing by their diſcourſe, that it was impoſſible to conquer the Land, diſſolving the aſſembly, returned each one to their houſes, lamenting with their wives and children, ſaying, That God had onely in words promiſed many things, but that in effect he gave them no aſſiſtance. Moreover, they blamed Moſes, and reviled both him and his brother Aaron, the high Prieſt. And thus ſpent they all the night in diſquiet, urging their diſcontents both againſt the one and the other. But on the morrow they reaſſembled their Councell, under this pretence, That ſtoning Moſes and his brother, they might return back again to Egypt, from whence they came. Which event, when two of the Spies greatly ſuſpected, (namely Jeſus, the ſonne of Nave, of the Tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the Tribe of Juda) they went into the midſt of them, and appeaſed the multitude; praying them to be of good hope, and not to challenge Almighty God of deceit, by yeelding certain ſlight belief to ſome, who by ſpreading vain rumours of the affairs of Canaan, had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, that they ſhould follow them, who both would be the actors and conductors alſo of them in the conqueſt of the Countrey: and that neither the greatneſſe of the mountains, nor the depth of the rivers, could hinder them, that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, eſpecially God being their guide, and readie to fight for them in that battell. March forward therefore, (ſaid they) and laying aſide all fear, (and being aſſured of the divine ſuccours) folllow us with a bold courage whithersoever we lead you. With theſe words laboured they to appeaſe the inſulting multitude. In the mean while, Moſes and Aaron falling proſtrate on their faces, beſought God, not for their own ſafety, but that it would pleaſe him to reſtore the deſpairing multitude to a better mind, who were troubled with ſo many preſent and inſtant neceſſities. Whereupon ſuddenly a Cloud appeared on the Tabernacle, and gave teſtimony, that God was there preſent. Which when Moſes perceived (drawing his ſpirits unto him) he preſſed into the preſence of the multitude, and told them, how God was incited and whetted to take puniſhment of the outrage which they had committed againſt him; yet not ſo ſeverely, as the iniquity of their ſinnes deſerved, but in that diſcipline which fathers are accuſtomed to uſe, for the inſtruction of their children. For at ſuch time as he ſtood before God in the Tabernacle, and beſought him with tears for the ſafety of the multitude, God had recounted unto him, how many benefits and favours they had received from him, and how ungratefull they ſhewed themſelves towards him: and that at the preſent being tranſported with the fear of the ſpies, they had eſteemed their reports more true, then his promiſes. Notwithſtanding all which, that he would not utterly conſume them all, nor exterminate their whole race, (whom he had honoured above all the Nations of the earth) but that he would not grant them the grace to conquer the Land of Canaan, neither making them partakers thereof; but would bring to paſſe, that they ſhould live in the deſart, without houſe or citie for the ſpace of fourtie yeers, for puniſhment of their tranſgreſſion. Yet hath he promiſed (ſaid he) to give the countrey to your ſucceſſours, whom he will make Lords of their goods, and heirs of thoſe poſſeſſions which you have envied your ſelves.

After that Moſes had diſcourſed theſe things after this manner, according to the ordinance of God, the people were in great ſorrow and calamity, and beſought Moſes, that he would appeaſe Gods wrath conceived againſt them; beſeeching him, that forgetting their faults that were paſt in the deſart, he would make them Lords of their enemies cities. Moſes anſwered them, that God was not incited againſt them according to the manner of humane weakneſſe, but that he had given a juſt ſentence againſt them. In this place it is not to be ſuppoſed, that Moſes (who was but a man onely) did appeaſe ſo many multitudes of diſpleaſed men, but that God aſſiſted him, and brought to paſſe, that the people were conquered with his words, (having with divers diſobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were falne, known, that obedience was both good and commendable. Furthermore, for that Moſes was admirable for his vertue, and the force proceeding from his faith: of whom not onely they have ſpoken, who lived in his time, but even at this day there is not any one amongſt the Hebrews, who (as if Moſes were now here preſent to chaſtiſe him, if he ranne aſtray) would not obey the Ordinances made by him, although he might make breach of them in ſecret.

Moſes, a man of great authority.

There

A There are beſides divers great and evident ſignes of the more then humane vertue which was in him: and amongſt the reſt, this was not the leaſt, That certain ſtrangers travelling out of the Regions beyond Euphrates a four moneths journey, to their great charges, and with no leſſe peril, to honour our Temple, and offer ſacrifice, yet could they not obtain licence or permiſſion to offer, in that by our laws it was not lawful for them to do it, and ſome other, without ſacrificing, (otherſome the ſacrifice half finiſhed, the reſt not permitted to enter the Temple) have returned back again to their homes, without finiſhing their purpoſes, chuſing rather to obey Moſes law, then their own wills; yet being reproved therein by none but their own conſciences. So much did the opinion once conceived of this
B man prevail, that he is eſteemed more then a man, who is ſuppoſed to have received laws from God, and to have delivered them to men. Of late alſo, (not long before the warres of the Jews, during the Empire of Claudius, and Iſmael being high Prieſt amongſt us) when as ſo great a famine oppreſſed our Nation that an Aſſar was ſold for four Drams, and there was brought to the feaſts of Azymes the quantity of ſeventy Cores, (which make thirty Sicilian and fourty Athenian Medimni, which are two buſhels of ours almoſt) ſome of the Prieſts were not ſo bold as to eat one grain of barley, notwithſtanding the countrey was in that extremity) fearing the law, and Gods diſpleaſure extended alwaies againſt ſinnes concealed. For which cauſe, we ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, conſidering, that the Writings left by Moſes, are in ſuch force, even at this day, that they themſelves who hate us, confeſſe, that he that hath inſtituted our government, is God,
C by the means and miniſtery of Moſes, and his vertue. But of theſe things, let every man think as it pleaſeth him.

CHAP. I.

The fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites: and their overthrow by them, without Moſes knowledge.

Numb 14. 4. The Iſraelites without Gods or Moſes command, deviſe how to aſſail the enemies.

WHileſt thus the Hebrews paſſed their life in great penury and perplexity in the Deſart, groning under the burthen of their grievous afflictions; there was nothing that more diſtracted and diſtempered them then this, That God had forbidden them to hazard or enter battel againſt the Canaanites. Neither would they now any longer give eare unto Moſes, (who perſwaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themſelves, that both without his conduct and counſels, they might eaſily obtain victory over their enemies: and accuſed him likewiſe, as if he ſought after no other thing, but that they being daily preſſed with great wants, ſhould be enforced continually to depend upon his counſels. Whereupon they embattailed themſelves againſt the Canaanites; preſuming with themſelves, that God would ſuccour them, not onely in regard of Moſes, but alſo for that he had a general care of their Nation, ever ſince the time of their forefathers, whom he had alwaies held under his protection; and by reaſon of whoſe vertues, he had already granted them liberty. They ſaid likewiſe, that if they would take the pains at that time, and endeavour themſelves, that God would alwaies fight with them: proteſting, that they were able to over-run the Nations, although they were but themſelves; yea, although Moſes would endeavour to eſtrange God from them. In a word, that it was behoofeful, that all of them ſhould be Lords of themſelves; and that being recomforted and redeemed from the ſervitude of Egypt, they ought not to ſuffer Moſes to tyrannize over them, or to conform their lives to his will; under this vain beliefe, that God had onely diſcovered to Moſes that which was behoofefull for them, by reaſon of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not derived from the loins of Abraham, and that he onely were the motive of all, in fore-knowing the things that ſhould happen unto them, by particular inſtruction from God? That even then they ſhould ſeem to be wiſe, if (condemning his pride, and fixing their truſt upon God) they would take poſſeſſion of the countrey which he had promiſed them, in ſpight of Moſes contradiction; who for this cauſe hindred them, ſetting the name of God before them: That therefore putting before their eyes their neceſſity, and the deſart, which daily more and more aggravated their miſery, they ſhould endeavour themſelves couragiouſly to ſally out againſt the enemy, the Canaanites; alledging, that God would be their guide; ſo as they had no reaſon to expect the aſſiſtance of their law-maker. At laſt, when this ſentence was approved by a generall allowance, they flock out in multitudes againſt their enemies: who neither affrighted by their fierce aſſault, neither terrified with their infinite multitude, valiantly reſiſted them, who deſperately charged them: ſo that (the better part of the Hebrews being ſlain) they purſued the reſt (enforced ſhamefully to turn their backs) even unto their Camp. This overthrow (happening beſide all mens opinion) wondrouſly dejected the minds of the multitude, that they grew deſperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had ſent and inflicted that plague upon them, becauſe without his counſell and favour they had enterpriſed the battel. But when Moſes perceived, that both his own countreymen were diſmaied with the overthrow which they had, and the enemy was waxen proud with their late victory, fearing likewiſe leſt (not content with their preſent ſucceſſe) they ſhould attempt further, he determined to retire his forces back again into the Deſart. And whereas the people promiſed thereafter to be obedient to him, (being taught by their own miſery, that nothing would fall out proſperouſly unto them, without the counſel and conduct of their guide) they diſ-incamping themſelves, retired into the Deſart under this reſolution, that they would no more attempt the battel againſt the Canaanites, before they received a ſign of their good ſucceſſe from heaven. But even as in a great army it accuſtomably falleth out (eſpecially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax head-ſtrong and diſobedient to their governours, ſo did the like alſo happen amongſt the Jews. For whereas they were in number ſix hundreth thouſand, and even in their better fortunes ſeemed diſobedient to their governours, ſo much the more were they exaſperated by their wants and misfortunes, both amongſt themſelves, and againſt their Governour. For which cauſe, there aroſe ſo great a ſedition, as neither among the Greeks or Barbarians the like was never heard of. Which things without doubt had overthrown them (being brought into ſo deſperate an eſtate) except Moſes (forgetting the injury he had received,

Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them : but although they were contumelious againſt their law-maker, and tranſgreſſed alſo againſt the laws which he had delivered them by Moſes, yet delivered he them out of that dangerous ſedition ; of which (without his eſpeciall Providence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable iſſue. This Sedition, as alſo how Moſes governed the eſtate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, having firſt expreſſed the cauſe thereof.

CHAP. II.

Chore (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongſt the Hebrews, and endewed with a certain kind of popular eloquence) ſeeing Moſes placed in the higheſt eſtate of dignitie, was ſore troubled and oppreſſed with envie. For although he were of the ſame tribe and kindred, yet thought he it to be a great indignitie in himſelf, to be held his inferiour, being both more enabled in riches, and nothing inferiour in Parentage, For which cauſe, he began to mutine and murmure againſt the Levites, (which were of the ſame Tribe with him, and his kinſmen) telling them (in vehement diſcourſe) that it was not to be ſuffered nor permitted, that Moſes, under a pretext of certain Divinitie, ſhould by ambitious policie (to other mens prejudice) onely ſtudy his own glory : C ſhewing them, how of late, without all Law and Right, he had given the Prieſthood to his brother Aaron, and diſtributed other dignities at his own pleaſure like a king, without the allowance and approbation of the people : That this injury done by him, was not to be endured, by reaſon that ſo covertly he had inſinuated himſelf into the Government, that before he might be eſpied, the people ſhould be brought under ſervitude. For, he that knoweth himſelf to be worthy of a Government, ſtriveth to obtain the ſame by kind perſwaſions, and conſent of the people, and not by force and violence, but they that deſpair by good means to attain thereunto, do notwithſtanding abſtain from force, leſt they ſhould looſe the opinion of their goodneſs and honeſty ; yet endeavour they by malicious ſubtilties to attain thereunto. That it concerned the Common-weal to extinguiſh and root out the D ſubtill inſinuations of ſuch men, leſt of Private, they ſhould at laſt grow publick enemies. For what reaſon (ſaid he) can Moſes yeeld, why he hath beſtowed the Prieſthood on Aaron and his ſonnes? For, if that God had decreed, that his honour ſhould be beſtowed on one of the Tribe of Levi, there were more reaſon that I ſhould have it, who am of the ſame kindred with Moſes, and who ſurpaſs him both in riches and age. And if this honour appertained to the moſt ancient of the Tribes, that thoſe of Rubens loyns ought by right to enjoy it, namely, Dathan, and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the moſt ancient of that Tribe, and the moſt powerfull in riches. Theſe things ſpake Chore, under colour and pretence of the weal of the Common-weale, but in effect onely to raiſe a tumult amongſt the multitude, and intrude into the office of the High Prieſt. This diſcourſe of his paſſing by little and little from one ear to another amongſt the multitude, and multiplied by the envious, E and ſuch as maligned Aaron, at laſt brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: ſo that two hundred and fiftie of the chiefeſt Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conſpiracy ; and all of theſe enforced themſelves to take away the Prieſthood from Moſes brother, and to transfer it to him. The people likewiſe were in ſuch ſort incenſed, as that they ſought to ſtone Moſes ; and ranne all of them by confuſed heaps with noiſe and uprore, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the Tyrant was to be cut off, and the people delivered from thraldome, who under pretext of Religion, had inſupportable thraldome impoſed on them. For if it were God that had choſen him to be High Prieſt, he would have F preferred ſuch a one to the dignitie who had been worthy, and would not have departed it to thoſe who were far inferiour to others : That if he had decreed to beſtow it on Aaron, he had remitted the Commiſsion of his Election to the people, and not left the diſpoſition thereof to his brother Moſes who long before that time had perceived Chores treacherous ſlander, and ſaw the people very ſore incenſed, was notwithſtanding nothing at all abaſhed thereat : but being reſolved in his Conſcience, that he had governed the eſtate uprightly, and well aſſured, that his brother obtained the Prieſthood, not by his favour, but Gods election, he came into the Congregation ; where he uttered no one word againſt the People, but addreſsing himſelf to Chore, he expoſtulated with him, and accuſed him, in as much as was for him possible; being (besides his other qualities) fashioned and composed by nature eloquently to speak in publick Assemblies. I think (saith he) Chore, that both thou and every one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundreth and fiftie men of his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemn not the rest of this Assembly, although they are not to be compared with you in riches, and other indowments. For neither doth Aaron therefore possesse the Priesthood, because he is richer, (for thou hast more ample possessions then either of us) neither because he is more noble) for God hath equally imparted the same unto us all, having given us one and the same Grandfather) neither have I "been moved thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due unto "others. For had I not respected God, and right, in disposing of this dignitie, I had not for- "gotten my self, to further and prefer another; since there is no man more near my self, then "my self, or whom I had rather wish well to, then to my self. For what wisedom had it "been for me, to expose my self to those dangers which they incurre, who make breach of "laws, to suffer another man reap the fruits of my impietie? But God forbid that my con- "science should be stained with any such sin: neither were the fault mine also, would God "leave it unpunished, neither in me, who should contemn him, neither in you, for that you "were ignorant of that ye ought to do, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He him- "self it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this means hath acquitted me of that ac- "cusation, that in this respect might be objected against me, For, although Aaron hath obtain- "ed this degree, (not by my favour, but by Gods own appointment) yet notwithstanding he "referreth and remitteth the matter to the publick disposition and order of you all; neither "requireth he any prerogative, for that he hath already exercited the charge, or for that at "this present it is granted him to intermeddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the "greatest good fortune that may befall him, to see your mutinies and seditions cease, al- "though with the losse of that honour, which he hath received from your own election. For "neither have we injured Gods will in this, that we also with your assent and allowance; but "that which of his own accord he hath given, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe consci- "ence: as reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable, that they which receive it, should alwaies "enjoy it, since God himself had given them both the assurance and confirmation. God "therefore shall once again determine, who, amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice "unto him, and to take charge of those things which appertain to Pietie. For it is a most ab- "surd matter, that Chore should have power to desire a dignitie, and that God should be de- "prived of that authoritie, to dispose the same as best liked him.

"Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selves, and to be troubled upon these occasi- "ons; and let every one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his "Censer with perfumes, and fire from his house. But thou, O Chore, give place unto God, "and expect his Election, neither arrogate to thy self a greater authoritie then God hath, but "come thou also amongst the rest of the competitors in this honour, to hear his judgement. "Neither see I cause, why Aaron should not be there also present, to be judged with thee, in "that hitherto he hath vertuously and uprightly behaved himself in the execution of that "office, and is likewise of the same Tribe and race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer "Incense in the presence of all the people, and when the perfume shall be past, let him whose "sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high "Priest: so shall I be acquit of that slander which is wrongfully urged against me, whereby I "am charged to have (upon my particular grace and favour) bestowed the office of the Priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gave over murmuring, and forbare to suspect Moses; allowing in themselves all that which had been spoken, as being profitable for the Common-weal. So that hereupon they dismissed the Assembly.

Moses oration to seditious Chore. v.8. &c.

CHAP. III.

How the Authors of the sedition were slain by Gods judgement, and the Priesthood confirmed to Aaron and his sons.

Rupin. cap.1. Num.16.31, & 32, 33.

THe next day the people re-assembled themselves together, to assist the sacrifice, and to hear the strife decided amongst the Competitors; neither was this Assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in suspence, in expectation of the event; and some of them were desirous, that Moses might be convicted of deceit. But such as were of the wiser sort amongst them, desired an end of the Sedition; for they feared lest the Common-weale should be utterly ruinated, if the Tumult should proceed

A ceed any further. The multitude likewiſe (being naturally deſirous of novelty, and prone to ſpeak evill of their Magiſtrates) were diverſly diſpoſed upon every occurrent. Moſes alſo ſent his ſervants to Abiram and Dathan, to ſummon them to appear (according to the covenants and accord) to attend the iſſue of the ſacrifice. But their anſwer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moſes by his ſubtil and ſiniſter devices, ſhould ſeiginorize over the people. Which when Moſes underſtood, he took divers of the Elders amongſt the people with him: and being no waies moved with Dathan and his contumacy, he came unto him (being willingly attended by thoſe who were drawn to accompany him.) Now when Dathan and his friends underſtood that Moſes with the Nobles came unto them, both they, their wives and children aſſembled themſelves before the B Tabernacle, expecting that which would enſue. They came likewiſe guarded with their ſervants, who were armed to oppoſe themſelves againſt Moſes, if ſo be he ſhould offer them any violence: But no ſooner drew he near unto them, but that lifting up his hands unto heaven, he cryed out with a loud voyce in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this manner: O God (ſaid he) thou Lord over all that which either heaven, earth, or ſea containeth, thou art a ſufficient witneſſe with me of all mine actions: for that I have managed all things by thy will, and thou art he who haſt given me power to execute my purpoſes: thou that alwaies in commiſeration of the Hebrews haſt been my perpetual help and aſſiſtance, hear this my prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee: for which cauſe I hope thou wilt not diſdain to teſtifie and juſtifie my truth, and maniteſt the ingratitude of theſe men. Thou doſt exactly know the antiquity of my race, not C for that thou haſt heard it, but for that thou haſt ſeen and aſſiſted it; in effect, now alſo teſtifie the truth for me in thoſe things which theſe men (although they know the contrary) are not aſhamed to impute unto me. At ſuch time as I led a peaceable life, and that by my vertue and thy counſel, and my father in law Raguels favour, I had ſufficient to live upon; I forſook the poſſeſſion of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, to ingage my ſelf in theſe miſeries, which I have ſuffered for theſe men: and firſt of all for their liberty, and now likewiſe for their ſafety, I have moſt readily undertaken grievous travels. Now therefore ſince I am grown into ſuſpition among thoſe men, who by my care and providence have eſcaped ſo many miſchiefes and miſeries; thou that appeareds't unto me in that fire on the mountain D of Sinai, and vouchſafedſt both to ſpeak unto me, and to confirm me by the ſight of miracles; that in thy name ſentſt me a meſſenger into Egypt; that haſt abated the great fortunes of the Egyptians, and haſt given me means to eſcape from their ſervitude; and haſt made Pharaohs power and army inferiour to my fortunes, that when we were ignorant of our way, gaveſt us a paſſage thorow the ſea, in whoſe bottome and womb afterward the Egyptians were drowned; that gaveſt us armes, when we were unweaponed; that madeſt the bitter water ſavory and fit to be drunk of; and in our ſcarcity of water enforcedſt drink for us out of the bowels of the hard rock, when we found no meat on the land, didſt ſend it us from the ſea; Moreover (as a thing never before heard of) affordedſt us meat from heaven, and haſt E eſtabliſhed our eſtate with laws and cuſtomes: Be thou, O Lord, my Judge in all things, and my unpartial witneſſe, that neither I have been corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, to favour injuſtice, neither that I have ſuffered a poor man in his juſt cauſe to loſe his right againſt a rich adverſary. And now having adminiſtred the Common-weale with all ſincerity, I am called in queſtion for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltleſſe, as if I had beſtowed thy Prieſthood on my brother for private affection, and not for thy command ſake: make it known that all things are diſpenſed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought to effect by caſualty, but by thy ſpeciall ordinance: And to expreſſe that thou haſt care of the Hebrewes, teſtifie the ſame by thy juſt puniſhment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuſe thee to be inſenſible, and boaſt that thou art circumvented by my ſubtilties. But thou ſhalt make thy revenge more notorious againſt the unbridled detractours of thy glory, if F they periſh after no common manner, leſt any man ſhould ſuſpect that they offer nothing inhumane: but let the earth, which they unworthily tread upon, open it ſelf and ſwallow them up both with their families and faculties. By this means both thy power will manifeſtly appear unto all men, and thou ſhalt leave an example to poſterity, that no man hereafter ſhall dare to think otherwiſe of thy Majeſty then becometh him; and my miniſtery ſhall be approved to proceed from thy direction. But if thoſe crimes be truely urged which are inforced againſt me, then let the curſes return and light on mine own head, and let thoſe whom I have curſed, live in ſafety. And thus exacting a puniſhment from thoſe that diſturb thy people, keep the reſt of the multitude in peace, concord, and obſervation of thy commandements, mandements, ſecure and void of that puniſhment which is due unto wicked men, for that it G is contrary to thy juſtice, that the innocent multitude of the Iſraelites ſhould anſwer their miſdeeds, and ſuffer their puniſhments. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, and intermixed them with teares, the earth inſtantly trembled, and ſhaking began to remove(after ſuch a manner as when by the violence of the wind a great billow of the ſea floateth and waltereth.) Hereat were all the people amazed. But after that, a horrible and ſhattering noiſe was made about their Tents,the earth opened,and ſwallowed up both them and all that which they eſteemed dear, which was after a manner ſo exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld. Whereupon in a moment the earth cloſed again, and the vaſt gaping was faſt ſhut, ſo as there appeared not any ſign of that which had hapned. Thus periſhed they all, leaving be- H hind them an example of Gods power and judgements. And this accident was the more miſerable in that there were no one, no not of their kinsfolks or allies that had compaſſion of them: ſo that all the people whatſoever,forgetting thoſe things which were paſt,did allow Gods Juſtice with joyfull acclamations, eſteeming them unworthy to be bemoned,but to be held as the plague and perverters of the people. After that Dathan with his Family was extinguiſhed, Moſes aſſembled all thoſe that contended for the Prieſthood together, committing again the election of the Prieſthood unto God, concluding that the eſtate ſhould be ratified to him, whoſe ſacrifice was moſt acceptable in Gods ſight. For which cauſe the two hundred and fiftie men aſſembled themſelves, who were both honoured for the vertue of their Anceſtors, and for their own abilities far greater then theirs: with theſe alſo ſtood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their cenſers before the Tabernacle, with per- I fumes ſuch as they brought with them; when ſuddenly ſo great a fire ſhone, as neither the like was ever kindled by mans hand, nor uſually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was ever quickned in the woods, ſplit and born down in the ſummer time by a Southern brize, but ſuch a one as ſeemed to be kindled in Heaven moſt brightſome and flaming: by force and power whereof thoſe two hundred and fiftie (together with Chore) were ſo conſumed, that there ſcarce appeared any reliques of their carcaſſes; Onely Aaron remained untouched, to the end it might appear that this fire came from Heaven. Theſe things thus brought to paſſe; Moſes (intending to leave a perpetuall memory to poſterity of that puniſhment) to the end they ſhould not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the ſon of Aaron to conſecrate their Cenſers affixed to the brazen Altar, that by reaſon of this Monument, all men might be terrified; who think that the Divine power can be circum- K vented by humane policy.

CHAP. IIII.

What things happened in the thirty eight years ſpace to the Hebrewes in the deſart.

Numb.17. 1,2, 3. ad finem.

AFter that by ſo evident an Argument it appeared very ſufficiently, that Aaron neither by ſiniſter inſinuations, neither by the favour of his brother,but onely by Gods election had obtained the Prieſthood; he ever afterwards held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the ſedition was not ſufficiently ceaſed, but that it brake out with a more urgent fury then at firſt: for it took his Originall from ſuch cauſes, that it might eaſily appear that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perſwaſion had once taken root in the hearts of men, that nothing is brought to paſſe without Gods will, L they imagined that God wrought theſe things in favour of Moſes; to him therefore imputed they all theſe things, as if God had not puniſhed thoſe men through the hate he bare againſt their ſins, but only on Moſes ſolicitation: and they were ſore aggreived that Moſes (having given this maim unto the people, by the loſs of ſo many Noble men, that onely periſhed through the zeal they bare to Gods Service) not only had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had aſſured the Prieſthood to his brother after ſuch a manner,that thereafter no man durſt oppoſe himſelf to purchaſe the ſame; ſeeing how unfortunately thoſe others were overcome by a violent death. Moreover the kinſmen of thoſe that were ſlain, ſollicited and ſtirred the people, praying them to reſtrain the pride and overgreat power of Moſes, in that it lay in their power eaſily to perform the ſame. But Moſes perceiving that M the people was incenſed, and fearing leſt once more they ſhould bethink them on ſome Innovation, whereby ſome great misfortune might ſucceed, he aſſembled them together, and gave audience to their accuſations: and without replying any wayes (for fear he might the more incenſe them) he onely commanded the heads of the Tribes, that each of them ſhould bring a rodd, wherein the name, of each Tribe ſhould be written, promiſing that the Prieſthood ſhould remain with them, in whoſe rodd God ſhould ſhew any ſigne. Which judge-

Another ſedition againſt Moſes.

A judgement of his being allowed by all men, both they, and Aaron brought their rods with their inſcriptions; and Aaron had written in his, the tribe of Levi. Theſe Moſes took from them, and laid them in Gods Tabernacle: the next day he brought them forth every one of them (which were eaſily known to be thoſe which the Princes brought, and the reſt of the people had marked) and they ſaw that all theirs remained in the ſame form which the day before they retained, when Moſes took them; but out of Aarons rod there grew branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kind of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amated at the novelty of this ſpectacle (dimiſſing their hatreds wherewith they both proſecuted Moſes and Aaron) became wholly amazed and drawn into admiration of Gods judgement, and forbare any
B more to repugne againſt God, or to oppoſe themſelves again Aarons Prieſthood. And thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all mens conſent he became high Prieſt; and the people of the Hebrewes turmoyled with long ſeditions, at laſt by this means grew ſetled in peace and quietneſſe. But after that Moſes had made the tribe of Levi (which was dedicate to Gods ſervice) free and exempt from warfare (for fear leſt being occupied in providing themſelves neceſſaries for their maintenance, they ſhould grow negligent in executing their duties in ſacrifice) he ordained that after the land of Canaan was conquered by their forces and Gods favour, that of the Cities they ſhould conquer, they ſhould diſtribute fourty eight of the beſt and faireſt on the Levites, and certain lands abutting on their Cities, to the quantity and ſpace of two thouſand cubits. Moreover, he commanded
C that the tenths of all the yearly fruit that was gathered by the whole people ſhould be given and beſtowed on the Levites and Prieſts and ever after this tribe had their ſolemn revenues. Now muſt I declare what things are proper to the Prieſts. Of the fourty eight Cities which were granted to the Levites, he commanded them to grant thirteen to the Prieſts; and that of thoſe tenths which they received of the people, they ſhould pay unto them a tenth ſhare. Beſides, he gave charge that the people ſhould offer up unto God all the firſt fruits of whatſoever the earth yeeldeth them: and that the firſt born of the four footed beaſts dedicated for ſacrifice, if it were a male, ſhould be delivered to the Prieſts to ſacrifice, to the end they might be nouriſhed with all their family in the ſacred City of Jeruſalem; and that they which are not fit to be ſacrificed to God, ſhould be eaten by them ac-
D cording to the uſe and cuſtome of the countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firſtling a ſicle and a half, and for the firſt born of a man, five ſickles. He allotted them likewiſe the firſt fruits of ſheep-ſharing, and ordered that the bakers ſhould offer them ſome cakes. But they that conſecrate themſelves by vow, and are called Nazarites (nouriſhing their hair, and taſting no wine) when as they conſecrate their hair, were bound to offer it unto the Prieſts. They likewiſe who call themſelves Corban, which is called the gift of God, if they deſire to be diſmiſſed from that miniſtery (whereunto by voluntary vow they bound themſelves) muſt pay money to the Prieſts, for a woman thirty ſickles, for a man fifty; and that thoſe that had not ſo much money, ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the Prieſts. And if any man ſhould
E kill (for his private feaſt) any beaſt, and not for Gods ſervice, yet that he ought to offer unto the Prieſt the breſt and legge of the beaſt. This is that allowance which Moſes ratified to the Prieſts, and beſides this, whatſoever the people offered for ſinnes (as we declared in the next precedent volume.) And whatſoever was contributed by the people to the order of the Prieſts, he commanded that both their wives, children and ſervants ſhould be made partakers of the ſame (onely except thoſe things which were offered for ſinne offerings, for theſe things onely the Prieſts themſelves eat up in the Temple the ſame day.) after that this policy was in this ſort ratified by Moſes, and that the mutiny was appeaſed, he removed his camp, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumæa, where he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King thereof, requiring him to grant him, and his, free paſſage (and offering him ſuch and ſo ſufficient pledges, as he ſhould eſteem and reckon of, to aſſure him that no violence F or injurie ſhould be offered; aſſuring him to make payment for whatſoever victuall or drink, either he or his army ſhould receive.) But he ſetting light by their Ambaſſage, denied them paſſage, and with a well furniſhed army marched forth againſt Moſes to withſtand him, if contrary to his will he ſhould attempt to paſſe thorow his countrey. And for that God had not counſelled Moſes to begin the combate, if he were enforced by the enemy, he retired back again, determining to ſeek his paſſage athwart the Deſart. At that time died his ſiſter Mary, the fourtieth yeare after their departure out of Egypt, and the firſt Moon of the moneth Xantique: ſhe was magnifically entombed at the common charge, on a certain mountain called Sein: and after the people had mourned for her fourty daies: he purified them them after this manner: The Prieſt taking a young heifer (which had never as yet born yoak nor laboured) in colour wholly red, led him a little apart from the Camp, in a moſt clean place, and there cut his throat; and with the bloud thereof, taken on his finger, he ſeven-times beſprinkled the Tabernacle of God: and after he had conſumed in fire the whole Hei-fer, with his skin and entrailes, he caſt a branch of Cedar into the fire, with a little Hyſope, and red Wooll, and wholly gathered up the aſhes thereof. A man that is cleanſed, putteth it in a clean place; and they that are unclean, by means of one that is dead, put a little of theſe aſhes into a Fountain, with Hyſope, and after they have mixed the aſhes in the Foun-tain, they beſprinkle themſelves three times, and on the ſeventh day, and after that, they are purified. He likewiſe ordained, that the like purification ſhould be uſed, when a man ſhould take poſſeſſion of his inheritance. G

But after the Army (that had ſo long mourned the dead ſiſter of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Deſart, into Arabia: and arriving in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitane City, in times paſt called Arce, and at this preſent, Petra) which is environed with a high mountain, Aaron aſcended the ſaid mountain; and Moſes ſhewed him the place where he ſhould yeeld up his ſoul unto God: and in the ſight of all the Army, ſtanding on a high place, he put off his Stoal, and gave it to his ſonne Eleazar, to whom by elderſhip the ſucceſſion appertained. And thus (in the ſight of the peo-ple) he died in that very year werein he loſt his ſiſter, and in the hundreth twenty and third year of his age. He departed on the new Moon, in the moneth of Auguſt, (called by the Athenians, Hecatombeon; by the Macedonians, Fous; and Sabba, by the Hebrews. The people mourned for him for the ſpace of fourty dayes, and then deſiſted. Moſes diſplaced his Camp, from thence, and pitched his tents near unto a River called Arnon (which ſpringeth from the mountains of Arabia, and runneth along the Deſart, and then entreth into the Aſphal-tique Lake ſeparating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The coun-trey is fertile, and ſufficient to yeeld fruit to all the inhabitants in great foiſon. To Sehon, King of this countrey, Moſes ſent Ambaſſadours, requiring paſſage thorow his Kingdome, un-der ſuch aſſurance as ſhould beſt pleaſe him, that no wrong ſhould be offered, neither to his countrey, nor the Inhabitants thereof: aſſuring him to pay the price of whatſoever his ſoul-diers took, either in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refuſed him, and arming his people, pitch-ed his Tents on the banks of Arnon, being ready to repulſe the Hebrews, if they preſumed to paſſe the River. H I K

BUt when Moſes perceived, that the Amorites were diſpoſed to hoſtility; for which cauſe, ſuppoſing that the injury and contempt was not to be endured, and ſeeing the Hebrews were an intractable kind of men, (and ſuch, as either by idleneſſe, or want, might be eaſily perſwaded to renue their former ſeditions and tumults, and being willing to prevent all theſe occaſions) he asked counſell at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his paſſage by the ſword. Now when God had allowed his purpoſe, and beſides that, promiſed him the victory, he was great-ly confirmed in hope, and animated and encouraged his ſoldiers; telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterpriſe their long deſired Warre with Gods fa-vour, and his approbation and encouragement: who rejoycing at this liberty that was grant-ed them, ſuddenly took Armes, and in a ſet battel haſted to charge the enemy. On the o-ther ſide, the Amorite (as ſoon as he ſaw them march forward, and begin the onſet) forget-ting his former fierceneſſe, was both himſelf terrified, and his ſouldiers likewiſe (who be-fore the ſight of their enemies, were as cruel and bloody as Lyons) now waxed as fearful and as meek as Lambes. So that they ſcarcely had endured the firſt aſſault, but that they fled; repoſing the whole hope of their proſperity in their retreat. they truſted likewiſe to their walled Townes (which notwitſtanding did nought at all avail them.) For no ſooner did the Hebrews perceive, that their enemies began to truſt their feet, and that their ranks were broken, but they more freſhly purſued them, and brought them to extream fear. So that being utterly put to flight, and diſperſed upon the field, they were enforced to flie unto their Cities. v. 35. The Hebrews overthrow the Amorites, and put them to flight.

Dart,

A Dart, and nimble in body, (by reaſon of their light Armors) they ranne after their enemies, and with their ſhafts and bowes ſhot at thoſe which were afarre off, and might not be overtaken. So that there followed a moſt huge ſlaughter, and they that eſcaped, were grievouſly wounded; yet were they more afflicted with thirſt then any other hoſtility (in that it was Summer time) ſo that all thoſe that went to refreſh and cool their thirſt at the river beſides all thoſe that had turned their backs to flie) were purſued with all kinds of miſſile weapons and darts untill they were all ſlain. The king Sehon himſelf alſo was ſlain in this fight. And the Hebrews ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain, and carried away great ſtore of pillage. They had likewiſe great foyſon and abundance of all kindes of fruites (in that the harveſt was not as yet gathered.) Thus paſſed the Army through the whole countrey, forraging and ſpoyl-
B ing the ſame without any reſiſtance; by reaſon that the enemy was diſcomfited, and that all his forces in warre were defeated. This was the deſtruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither uſed their counſell prudently, nor managed their warre valiantly. But the Hebrews occupied their countrey (ſcituate between three rivers, after the manner of an Iland.) For the banks of Arnon do terminate the Southerne coaſts thereof, and Jobacchus the Northerne, which flowing into Jordan, leeſeth his name: now the Weſtern coaſt is watered by the river of Jordan. Amidſt this proſperous eſtate of the Iſraelites, there aroſe a new enemy againſt them, called Og king of Galadine, and of the Countries of Gaulanitis, who came as a friend and companion to aſſiſt Sehon; who ſeeing his fortunes and eſtate ſo deſolate and deſperate, yet in hope to obtain the victory, determined to make triall both of his own
C mens vertue, and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for he both died in the battel, and his whole hoſt was likewiſe diſcomfited. But Moſes no ſooner overpaſſed the floud of Jobacchus, but that entring Ogs kingdome, he overthrew one city after another & deſtroyed all the inhabitants thereof (who for riches and fruitful paſtures exceeded all other men of that countrie.) Og alſo was a man of a moſt heroicke and high ſtature, and nothing inferiour thereunto either in ſtrength or vertue; the argument of whoſe ſtrength and ſtature was extant in the ſack of the chief city and palace of the country of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron bed found of four cubits breadth, and nine in length. The fall of this man did not onely further the preſent felicity of the Hebrews, but alſo be-D came the cauſe of many their future and more fortunate ſucceſſes; for they took ſixty well fortified cities which were under his government; and what with their privy preyes and publique pillage, they were all enriched. After this, Moſes removed his camp toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad plain neere unto the City of Jericho (which is rich and fruitful and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the minds of the Iſraelites in ſuch ſort confirmed, as they deſired nothing more then war, and battel; and Moſes thinking good to make uſe of this their forwardneſſe, (having ſacrificed to God in way of thankſgiving, and feaſted the people) he ſent part of them armed to deſtroy the countrey of the Madianites, and to ſpoyl the cities of that Region: the cauſe of which war had this original.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

WHen Balac King of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites) ſaw the Iſraelites increaſe to ſuch greatneſſe, he be-
F gan to ſuſpect the ſecurity of his own fortune and eſtate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrews to covet to poſſeſſe any other countrey but the land of Canaan, and therefore more raſhly then prudently he bethought him of new matters; and for that he durſt not aſſail them in battel, whom he knew to be puffed up with the ſucceſſe of many victories (yet deſirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he ſendeth Embaſſadors to the Madianites to conſult with them, as concerning their common profit. They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous divine called Balaam (who was their eſpecial friend) ſent ſome of their moſt honourable princes together with Balacks Embaſſadors, beſeeching him that he would come unto them and curſe the Iſraelites. The Prophet entertaining the Embaſſadors with great humanity, and feaſting them at his own table, asked counſel of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands: but ſeeing that God forbad him to obey them, he returned unto them, and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withſtood him; to whoſe mercy he aſcribed the glory which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies: for that army which they deſired ſhould be curſed, was dearly beloved of God. For which cauſe he gave them counſell, that ſeeking out the Iſraelites, they ſhould make peace with them under what-

The yeare of the world,2493. before Christs Nativitie,1471 ing instantly requested by Balac) once more sent their Embassadours to Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to satisfie them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadours: and he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadors. But as he travelled upon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certain narrow way, between two mounds or wals made of stones; which when the Asse perceived whereon Balaam was mounted, he started out of the way, and thrust Balaam, and crushed him against one of the wals; and neither by the strokes which his rider gave him (being sore grieved by his bruise) nor by any other means might he be drawn forward. And when as neither the Angel forsook the way, neither the Prophet gave over tormenting the Asse, at length the beast falling down H by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice: blaming him, for that having never before that time received domage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten him; considering that he understood not that God did prohibite him from the performance of that which he desired. Whilst thus he was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Asse, an Angel appeared unto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Asse was not in the fault, but that he hindred his journey, by reason he attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the Prophet terrified, addressed himself to return back again: but God commanded him to prosecute that journey which he had intended, charging him to declare and do that which he should advise and instruct him in.

Which when he perceived, he caused the king to build seven Altars, on which he laid seven Bulls, and seven Rammes. All which being readily executed by the King; he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end he might presage and fore-prophecy the victory: which done, he spake after this manner: Happy are you, on whom God bestoweth so large a blessing and abundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his providence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. But Balac was sore incensed against him, exclaiming that he had not kept covenant, although M by great rewards he had been by his Confederate drawn thither to curse them, urging it against him, that in stead of execrations against them, he had published their piety and praises. v. 1, 2, 3. The daughters of Madian allure the Iſraelites to Idolatrie.

v. 6. The Hebrewes blinded with the love of the women, revolt from the laws of their fathers.

The Hebrewes blinded with the love which they bare unto the Virgins, conceived well of their words, and conſented to that which they ſaid, ſuffering themſelves to be ſeduced according as they were invited; ſo that they tranſgreſſed the ordinances of their Fathers in following ſtrange gods; to whom they purpoſed to do ſacrifice according to the manner of the Countrey. They took pleaſure alſo to eat ſtrange kinds of meats which were prohibited them by the Law, and addicted themſelves to all kinds of pleaſure, according as the women perſwaded them, ſo that the whole Army was infected with a diſſolute diſorder (amongſt the younger ſort) and a worſe mutiny aroſe thereby then the precedent, wherethrough it was to be ſuſpected, leaſt the whole courſe of law and Government ſhould be perverted. For the youth once having had a touch of theſe forrain and laſcivious faſhions, were unſatiably tranſported with the ſame: And if there were any more excellent then others in Nobilitie, they together (with the reſt of the multitude) were rechleſly wcorrupted. Zimbrias also of the Tribe of Simeon (and one of the Princes among them, marrying Cosby the Madianite, daughter unto Uri a Governour of that Countrey at the commandment of his wife, and in contempt of Moſes lawes, for her ſake did ſacrifice after a forrain manner, and contrarie to the Law diſported with his forrain wife which was a ſtranger. During this eſtate of affairs, Moſes being afraid leſt ſome more grievous miſchief ſhould ſucceed, called the people together, accuſing no man in particular (for that he was unwilling to draw them into "deſperation, who whileſt they think they lie hidden, may be reduced to a better mind) "but he told them that it was a thing unworthie and ill-beſeeming themſelves or their el- "ders, that they ſhould ſet more by their pleaſures, then by God and their Religion. That "it behoved them whileſt they had time, to repent themſelves, and that they ſhewed them- "ſelves to be valiant men, not by contempt of laws, but by appeaſing their diſordinate de- "ſires. Beſides he told them that it was an abſurd thing, that whereas in the deſart they lived "modeſtly, they ſhould now in a plentiful Countrie grow ſo diſſolute & diſordinate, as to loſe "that by affluence which they had got by temperance. In ſuch like ſpeeches he indeavoured to correct the youth, and to reduce them to a better mind: whereupon Zambrias riſing up, ſpake after this manner, Moſes (ſaith he) uſe thou thine own laws (whereunto by long uſe thou haſt added ſtrength and confirmation) which hadſt thou not done, oft-times ere this hadſt thou ſuffered puniſhment, and learnt to thine own miſerie, that the Hebrewes were not to be "deluded: for my ſelf thou ſhalt never tie me to thy tyrannical decrees, for hitherto haſt thou "indeavoured nought elſe, but under pretext of law and religion, to bring us into ſervitude "and ſubjection; and thy ſelf ſhal by the ſubtill and ſiniſter means, to honour & ſoveraigntie; "taking from us the pleaſures and libertie of our lives (things that belong to free men, & ſuch "as appertain or live not under any mans government.) I likewiſe ſacrifice to the gods contrarie to our cuſtom, becauſe I ſuppoſe it to be both juſt and neceſſarie, that from many I ſeek the truth, and not (depending as it were upon a tyrannie, or living thereunder) to build my faith upon one onelie? For no man ſhall pleaſe me that will have more intereſt in mine actions then my ſelf. Zambrias oration againſt Moſes.

A growing impudent in their ſpeeches, ſhould ſtirre up tumults amongſt the people: ſo that the aſſembly for this time was after this manner diſſolved, and perhaps this miſchief had taken further head, except Zambrias had been ſuddenly cut off, by ſuch a means as enſueth. Phinees (both in reſpect of other things, as alſo the dignitie of his father, the chiefeſt among the youths, and the ſonne of Eleazar the high Prieſt, whoſe great Uncle Moſes was) was grievouſly diſcontented with Zambrias contumacie; and leſt by his impunitie the Law might grow into contempt, he reſolved to be revenged upon the tranſgreſſors, being well aſſured how much the example of great men prevaileth on both parts, and whereas he was of ſo much ſtrength of minde and of body, as that he would not attempt any thing raſhly, which he would not bring to iſſue, he repaired to Zambrias Tent, and at one ſtroke ſlue both him B and Chosbi, his wife. By whoſe example, the reſt of the youth (being exaſperated by this his worthy act) enforced themſelves to do juſtice on thoſe that had committed the like offence; ſo that they ſlue a great part of them by the ſword, and the reſt by the peſtilence (which was inflicted by Gods judgement on them) were utterly rooted out. Neither ſpared he thoſe, who though by reaſon of conſanguinitie they ought to have reſtrained and diſſwaded their kinſmen from lewdneſſe, yet had rather either diſſemble, or kindle their luſt in them, then counſell them; neither intermitted he from puniſhing thoſe men, till fourteen thouſand of them were done to death by ſickneſſe. For which cauſe, Moſes (being incenſed againſt the Madianites) ſent out an Armie to deſtroy that Nation (of which expedition we will preſently diſcourſe, after that we have annexed that which was omitted in this Hiſtory.) C For reaſon would, that we ſhould not pretermit to praiſe the deſigne of our Law-maker in this behalf. For in regard of Balaam, (ſought out by the Madianites, under the intent to curſe the Hebrews, although he could not do it, being hindred therefro by the providence of God, who notwithſtanding gave that counſell to the enemie, by means whereof, within a little ſpace a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their courſe of life, and divers have been grievouſly plagued with ſickneſſe) in regard I ſay of this Balaam, he hath greatly honoured him, in chronicling his predictions in his Writings. And although it had been eaſie for him to have deprived him of the glorie, and to have appropriated it to himſelf, by reaſon that there was not any witneſſe that might contradict him; yet neglected he D not to give teſtimonie of him, and to make mention of him in his Writings: Yet let every one think of this, according as it ſhall ſeem good unto him. But Moſes (as I began to ſay) ſent an Armie of twelve thouſand men againſt the Madianites, chuſing out of every Tribe one thouſand ſouldiers, and appointed Phinees Captain over theſe Forces, by whoſe induſtrie (as a little before I have declared) both the Laws were ſatisfied, and Zambri (that brake the ſame) was puniſhed.

The Hebrews fight againſt the Madianites, and overcome them. Numb. 31.

E BUt the Madianites (having intelligence that their enemies drew neer unto them, and that they were not farre off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and beſet all thoſe paſſages of their countrey, by which they thought their enemie might break in, addreſſing themſelves to repulſe them with force and valour. But no ſooner did Phinees with his forces charge them, and ſet upon them, but that (upon the firſt encounter) ſo great a multitude of the Madianites was ſlain, that the number of the carcaſſes might not be accounted. Neither were their kings in like ſort ſaved from the ſword: theſe were Og, Sures, Robeas, Ubes, and the fifth Receemus (from whom the chiefeſt Citie of the Arabians deriveth his name, and at this day retaineth the ſame, and is called Receme, which the Grecians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrews having thus put their F enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and carried and drove away with them a great prey; and killing all the inhabitants thereof, both men and women, they onely ſpared the Virgins, (for this command had Phinees received from Moſes hands:) who returning home with his Armie in ſafetie, brought with him a memorable and mighty prey; of Oxen, fiftie and two thouſand, ſixtie and ſeven; of aſſes, ſixtie thouſand; of golden and ſilver veſſels a great number (which thoſe of that countrey were wont to uſe in their domeſticall affairs.) For by reaſon of their great riches, they lived very delicately. There were alſo led captive from thence about thirtie thouſand virgins. But Moſes (dividing the prey) gave the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Prieſts, and to the Levites another fiftie: as for the remainder, he diſtributed it amongſt the people. afterwards they lived in great ſecuritie, having gotten riches by their vertue, and peace alſo G to enjoy the ſame. Now for that Moſes was well ſtricken in yeers, he appointed Ieſus (who, if need were, might ſucced him in the Offices, both of a Prophet, and a Prince, and Governour; for God had ſo commanded that he ſhould make choice of him) to be his ſucceſſor in the principalitie. For he was moſt expert in all divine and humane knowledge; being therein inſtructed by his maſter Moſes. About that time, the two Tribes of Gad and Ruben, with the half Tribe of Manaſſes (being abundantly ſtored with cattell, and all other manner of riches) by common conſent beſought Moſes that he would give and aſſigne to them in particular the countrey of the Amorites, which not long ſince they had conquered by the ſword, for that it was full of rich paſtures. But he (ſuſpecting leſt ſurprized with fear, they did detract and withdraw themſelves from the battell of the Canaanites, and that under the H pretext of the care of their cattell, they covered their ſloth) highly taunted and controlled them, ſaying that they were fearfull diſſemblers: He accuſed them likewiſe, that their deſire was to poſſeſſe that land, which was conquered by the common valour of the people, to the end they might lead their lives in idleneſſe and pleaſure; and that bearing arms with the reſt of the hoſt, they would not help to poſſeſſe the land beyond Iordan, which God had promi-ſed them, by overcoming thoſe Nations which he commanded them to account for their enemies. Who perceiving that he was diſpleaſed (leſt he ſhould ſeem to be deſervedly incenſed againſt them) anſwered, that neither through fear they fled danger, neither by reaſon of ſloth ſhunned labour, but onely ſhot at this, that leaving their prey in commodious places, they might be more fit to enter conflict: ſaying, that they were readie (if ſo be they might I receive Cities for the defence and receipt of their wives, children, and ſubſtance) to follow the reſt of the armie whither-ſoever they were conducted; and to adventure their lives with them, for the common ſucceſſe. Whereupon Moſes (allowing their forwardneſſe, and aſſembling Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Ieſus, with the reſt of the Magiſtrates) granted them the land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the people joyned unto them in conſanguinitie) they ſhould warfare againſt their common enemie, till all things were accompliſhed according to their deſire: and by this means having received that which they demanded, and builded them walled Cities, they left their children, wives and ſubſtance in the ſame. Moſes alſo builded ten Cities in that Region (which are to be reckoned in the num- K ber of thoſe fourtie and eight) in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries and places of refuge, which they onely might take benefit of, who fled thither for chance-meddly; and he appointed them their terme of exile till ſuch time as the high Prieſt died, under whom the man-ſlaughter was committed: at ſuch time they might ſafely return into their countrey.
And during the time of their exile, it was not lawfull for any of the kinne to take revenge againſt the offender by his death, onely at ſuch time as he found him without the Citie of refuge: and that right he onely ratified to thoſe that were a kinne, but not unto others. Now the Cities of refuge were theſe: in the confines of Arabia, Boſora: in the Region of Galade-na, Arimanum: in the countrey of Batanеades, Gauladeaman: And after the conqueſt of Canaan ſo many Cities of the Levites (by the commandment of Moſes) were appointed to L that end that they might give refuge and habitation to ſuch ſort of offenders. At that time when one of the Magiſtrates called Salpades, of the tribe of Manaſſes, was dead (and had one-ly left behinde him children of the weaker ſex) the Governours of the Tribe came unto Moſes, and asked his counſell, whether in the diſtribution of the lands, they ſhould levie out any part or portion for them? Who anſwered them, That if they married within their Tribe, they ſhould have their dowrie; but if they made choiſe to handfaſt themſelves in another Tribe, that then they ſhould looſe their patrimonie in their own: and for this cauſe made he this ordinance, to the end, that every tribe ſhould continually poſſeſſe his proper inheri- M tance. But whereas now there remained but thirtie daies onely, to fulfill the number of thoſe

Moſes oration unto the people before his death. Deut. 4. 1. ad 43

MY dear friends and fellow ſouldiers, companions in my long travell, ſince it is ſo thought requiſite by God, and mine age (attaining to the full number of one hundred and twenty years) requireth no leſſe, but that I muſt depart out of this life; and ſince it ſeemeth not good in Gods ſight, that either I ſhould be agent, or aſſiſtant in your affairs beyond Jordan: I have thought it requiſite that (in as much as appertaineth to your felicity) I ſhould not now alſo fail or default in my dutie towards you; but that according to the grace that is given me, I ſhould provide that by laying open the way unto you that leadeth to the ſame, I may ſeem worthy amongſt you to merit eternall glorie and memorie. Give therefore eare unto me, that when as I have firſt declared unto you, wherein both your felicitie, and the happineſſe of your poſteritie conſiſteth, and have left this perpetuall teſtimony and monument of my intire love towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: for well I know that I deſerve to be credited by you, both for that beforetimes I have inceſſantly (in ſtudying for your profits) never deceived you, as alſo for that the ſoul (being ready to be ſeparated from the body) becometh more accompliſhed in all vertue and verity. Ye ſonnes of Iſrael, there is but one onely cauſe whereby men attain unto felicity, to wit, the favour of God, which he is onely able to give to thoſe that deſerve it, and to withdraw it from thoſe that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutifull (according as he requireth, and in ſuch manner as I according to his direction, do inſtitute you) you ſhall never fail to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happineſſe: and that which is more, thoſe goods which you have now obtained, ſhall be perpetuall, and that which you want, ſhall ſhortly be plentifully beſtowed on you. Onely indeavour you your ſelves to be ſubject to Gods will, and odedient to his Commandments: and neither purpoſe unto your ſelves any other laws then thoſe I have given you, neither through contempt innovate any thing in your religion. Which if you ſhall perform, you ſhall excel all other Nations in warre, and grow invincible againſt your enemies: for by Gods aſſiſtance all threats are eaſily contemned. Moreover, there are great rewards (in all the courſe of life) propoſed unto vertue, and ſhe her ſelf to her ſelf is a chief and eſpeciall reward: beſides, by her all other bleſſings are eaſily obtained, which if you entertain among your ſelves, you ſhall both lead a bleſſed life, and obtain immortall glorie, not onely amongſt ſtrangers, but alſo in all poſterities. Theſe things are you to hope upon, if neither you your ſelves violate thoſe laws (which by Gods command, and mine induſtry) are ſet down unto you, neither ſuffer any other to violate the ſame, but in your ſelves continually meditate upon the underſtanding and uſe thereof. As for my ſelf, I depart this life in fulneſſe of joy, rejoycing at theſe your good fortunes, and commending you all to the laws of piety and prudence, and the vertue of your guides and magiſtrates, who hereafter are to take care of your ſafetie and felicity. God likewiſe, under whoſe conduct you have lived (and to whoſe favour you owe whatſoever you have received by me) will not fail to take care of you, but as long as you ſhall honour both him and piety, ſo long ſhall you remain in ſecurity under his protection: neither ſhall you want ſuch men, who ſhall give you ghoſtlie inſtructions, whoſe counſells if you obey, you ſhall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Jeſus with the Senate and Magiſtrates of the Tribes) towards whom beware leſt you grow ſtiffe-necked, knowing and remembring this, that he that is inſtructed to obey well (when he ſhall attain unto dignitie) will govern well. Neither ſuppoſe you that liberty conſiſteth herein, if you mutine againſt the commandments of your Princes: for hitherto have you repoſed your libertie in your contumacie towards your benefactors; from which ſinne if hereafter you ſhall bleſſe your ſelves, you ſhall ſee your eſtate wax ſtill more flouriſhing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you ſhould ever be ſo exaſperated againſt theſe, as you have been ſometimes incenſed againſt me. For if you remember your ſelves, I have been more oftentime in hazard of my life by your means, then by the enemie: Which I ſpeak not therefore unto you to upbraid you therewith, for I would not leave you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the hour of my death, (who even at that time entertained the injurie with a quiet mind) but to the end that being by me admoniſhed, you ſhould henceforward be wiſer in thoſe things which hereafter ſhall concern you, and leſt you ſhould grow contumelious againſt your governors, being made proud with affluence of your riches, which you ſhall enjoy at ſuch time as you have overpaſſed Jordan, and conquered Canaan. Otherwiſe if made more inſolent by theſe G bleſſings you fall into contumacy, and contempt of vertue, Gods favour will never be extended towards you; whom, if by your ſinnes you ſhall incenſe againſt your ſelves, you ſhall both loſe the land which you have conquered by your courage, by being ſhamefullie oppreſſed by your enemies, and being diſperſed over the face of the whole earth, you ſhall fill both the land and ſea with your ſervitude; which if it ſhould come to paſſe, then were it too late "to repent you, that you have not obſerved the laws of your nation. Wherefore (to the intent "to avoid this danger, and for fear you violate the ſame) ſuffer not any of your enemies, after "your victorie is once gotten, to live; and think it more conducible for your affairs, for fear leſt living with them, and intangled in the like ſtudies and delights, you corrupt and deprive H your Countrie laws and inſtitutions. Morever, I command you to deſtroy their gods, their altars, and temples, as many ſoever as you ſhall meet with, and ſo to raze them both with fire and flame, as there may not remain anie token or memorie of them anie more: For ſo ſhall "you more ſafelie maintain your eſtates. But leſt through ignorance of better things your na-"ture be depraved by the worſer, by Gods commandment I have written you laws, and a form "of adminiſtration, both of the Common-weal, and your private eſtates; from which if you "ſhall no waies divert, or wander, you ſhall prove the moſt fortunate people of the earth.

Moſes deliver-eth the Iſraelites a book where in their laws & manner of life was written.

When he had ſpoken theſe things, he delivered them a book, containing in writing their laws, and cuſtomes of good life: which when they had heard and received, they melted in tears, and now lamented they both for the loſſe of their Captain, as alſo for that they re- I membred them how many perils he had ſuffered, and how diligently he had procured their ſafety and ſecurity: and they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recover ſo good a Prince: and they ſuſpected likewiſe that God would not hereafter be ſo favourable unto them, in that they had not a Moſes to pray for them. Beſides, they repented them of thoſe things which (through fury) they committed againſt him in the Deſart, and were grievouſly ſorry: ſo that all the people (breaking out into tears) would admit no conſolation. But Moſes recomforted them, and prayed them to give over weeping, and incouraged them to receive their laws: and ſo for this time diſſolved the aſſembly. But now before I addreſſe my ſelf to manifeſt the reſt, I have thought it meet to inſert in this place the law of this law-giver, worthy both his majeſty and vertue: whereby the Reader may know what our laws have been, even from the firſt time, and inſtitution of our Common-any thing in way of ornament: we have onely renewed the order, and thoſe laws which he ſcatteringly ſet down according as he received them from God, we have generally digeſted into their places: whereof I thought good to admoniſh the Reader, for fear leſt hereafter any of our Tribes coming to the view hereof, ſhould raſhly accuſe me, for that I had not ſcarce faithfully delivered the writings and inſtitutions of Moſes. Now will I reckon up thoſe laws in eſpecial, which appertain to the publique inſtitution and rites of our Nation: but thoſe things that concern private cuſtomes and contracts, either betwixt our ſelves or forrain Nations, I have deferred to be diſcourſed of in that commentary, wherein (by Gods aſſiſtance) I intend to debate of our manners, and method in ſacred cauſes.

Item, the Iſraelites ſhall live in the land of Canaan.

After that you have gotten the land of Canaan, built your Cities, and have begun in ſecu- L rity to reap the fruit thereof; in obſervation of theſe commandments, you ſhall gratifie God highly, and eſtabliſh your atchieved felicity. Let there be one ſacred city in the region of Canaan, ſcituate in a famous and fertile place, which God ſhall make choice of for himſelf, and

But in

For it is behoovefull that they ſhould know one another, who are of the ſame ſtock, and are delighted in the ſame ſtudies. Likewiſe, if any man take reward for covering a bitch (whether ſhe be for the chaſe, or for the

Let no man ſpoil any ſtrange temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a garment woven of linnen and woollen, for it belongeth onely to the Prieſts.

Every ſeventh yeer, when the people ſhall be aſſembled together in the ſacred Citie to ſacrifice upon the feaſt of Tabernacles, at ſuch time as the feaſt approacheth, the high Prieſt from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) ſhall read the Law unto all of them: ſo that neither women nor children ſhall be exempted from the hearing of the ſame, no not the very ſlaves and bondmen. For it is requiſite that they retain the C perpetuall memorie thereof, alwaies imprinted in their minds: for ſo ſhall they ſinne the leſſe, in that they underſtand what is decreed in the Law. The laws likewiſe ſhall be of more force in the conſciences of thoſe that ſhall offend, whileſt they infix in the midſt of thoſe that hear them, their doctrines intermingled with menaces: ſo that the will to perform the Law ſhall never be inwardly extinguiſhed: and beſides that, the remembrance will live in them, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children in eſpeciall learn the laws, then which diſcipline there is not any more honeſt; neither more conducible unto felicitie. Twice in the day, in the morning and in the evening about bed time, let God be honoured for his benefit of our deliverance out of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reaſonable, to give thanks unto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we have
D before time received, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of theſe alſo are to be written over our doors, and worn on our arms: and thoſe things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be born about, written on the head and arms, that every way Gods bountie may be ſeen towards his people. In every Citie or Townſhip let there be ſeven governours, ſuch as are approved in vertue, and famous for their juſtice: let each one of theſe Magiſtrates have two Miniſters of the Tribe of Levi. Let thoſe that are appointed Judges in the Cities be held in high reputation: ſo that in their preſence no man preſume either to urge contumelies, or injurious ſpeeches: for ſo ſhall it come to paſſe, that men accuſtomed to do reverence, ſhall alſo exerciſe themſelves in piety, and grow ſo much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatſoever ſeemeth good to the Judges to E decree, let that be held inviolable; except it be apparant that they be corrupted with money, or that they may be manifeſtly convicted of a wrongfull judgement. They ought likewiſe to judge without reſpect of lucre or dignity, and prefer juſtice before all other things: for this injury ſorteth out to Gods contumely, as if it were to be ſuppoſed, that he is to be ſuſpected to be weaker then they, for whoſe ſake they wreſt the Law contrary to equity: for Gods power is juſtice: he therefore that giveth judgement in favour and partiality of great men, maketh them greater then God himſelf. And if the Judges cannot determine of the matter in queſtion (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them refer the cauſe to the ſacred Citie, and then ſhall the high Prieſt and the Prophet, with the aſſiſtance of the Senate, de-F termine that which ſhall be convenient.

Neither is it lawful for a man-ſervant to bring in teſtimony, by reaſon of his degenerate and ignoble mind: for it is to be ſuſpected, that either for lucre ſake, or for fear, he will depoſe an untrue teſtimony. And if any falſe witneſſe ſhall fortune to be beleeved, and he afterwards be convicted of perjury, let him be ſubject to that penalty, which he ſhould have endured that ſhould have been caſt by his falſe accuſation. Ariſtocracy the beſt kind of government. Deut. 17. 15. The government of the Peers is the beſt kind of regiment of all other ſorts of government: take you therefore heed that you deſire no other form of policie, but retain and continue the ſame, having no other ſuperiours but the laws; and managing your affairs by your ſelves. Yet notwithſtanding, if you ſhall grow in deſire to to have a king, ſee that ye elect one of your own Nation, that he in all things may be ſtudious to procure juſtice, and all other vertues perſwading himſelf that God and the laws are moſt upright: Let him not undertake any thing without the advice of the high Prieſt, and the counſell of the Elders. Let him not have divers wives, neither let him hunt after huge treaſures, nor multitudes of horſes: for fear leſt poſſeſſing them, he become ſo inſolent, as that he raiſe his power and will above the laws: I and if you ſee him affectioned unto theſe things, beware leſt he grow more puiſſant then is expedient for you.

Deut. 19. 14. The bounds of lands are not to be removed. It is not lawful for any man to remove the land-marks, neither of his own land, or any other mans whatſoever; for by this means is the peace conſerved; Let each one therefore forbear to remove them becauſe they are as the voice of God, aſſured for ever. For warres and ſouldiers are raiſed thereby, when ſuch as would augment their inheritance, ſtrive alwaies to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: and they that are ſo hardie to remove the ſame, are not farre from contempt of the laws.

Levit 25. 3. The plants that are not of four yeers growth are prohibited. He that ſhall plant a piece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth K yeer, the firſt fruits thereof ſhall not be offered unto God, neither ſhall any man eat thereof, by reaſon that the time is inconvenient, and permitteth not that the trees ſhould fructifie as yet; and nature her ſelf is as it were inforced before her time, whereby the fruit is neither convenable for God, nor convenient for the uſe of man. But all that fruit that ſhall grow in the fourth year (for then is the time that the trees ſhould bear) ſhall be gathered and brought into the holie Citie (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they ſhall be eaten during the feaſt which the Lord thereof maketh to his friends, and with orphans and widows, but in the fifth year it ſhall be lawful for him to gather the fruit for himſelf.

Vines to be planted. The law of the plough. Deut. 22. 10. Sowe not a field that is planted with vines, for it ſufficeth that it nouriſheth one ſort of plants: ſo that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to L be plowed with oxen: neither are any other ſorts of beaſts to be yoked with them, but the tillage muſt alwaies be performed by beaſts of the ſame kind.

The ſeeds alſo ought to be clean and without any mixture; ſo that two or three ſorts ought not to be ſowed together: for nature alloweth not a commixion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull alſo to cover the female with the male of another kind: for it is to be feared that this filthineſſe ſhould draw men to forget themſelves; and grow in contempt of that ſex which is appropriate unto them: for it often falleth out, that from ſmall beginnings, things wax worſer and worſer. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chance to grow any maime in policie: for which cauſe the laws diſſemble not (no not the lighteſt things,) to the end they may no way ſeem to be deficient in their nature. M

Levit. 19. 10. Deut. 24. 21, 22. Some gleanings are to be left for the poor in the field. They that mow and reap corn, ought not to glean, but to leave ſome eares for thoſe that are in neceſſitie, to the end to ſuccour them. They likewiſe that plant vines, ought to leave ſome cluſters for the poor, and ſome fruit on the olive-trees, to the intent that they that have none of theſe, may gather ſome little thing for their relief: for the owners of the field ſhall not reap ſo much profit by the ſparing inning of their corn, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poor ſhall reap by their gleaning: for God will bring to paſſe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but ſhall have care of the nouriſhment of thoſe that are in neceſſitie) ſhall be farre more fat and fertile to bring forth and nouriſh her fruit.

A Neither is the mouth of the ox to be muzzled, at ſuch time as he treadeth the corn in the Mow: For it ſtandeth not with reaſon, that they who have been partakers of the labour, and have travelled for the encreaſe of the fruits, ſhould be bridled from the uſe and benefit thereof. The year of the world, 2493. before Chriſts Nativity, 1511.

Neither ought the Traveller alſo in his journey to be denied to gather and taſte the fruits of Autumne, but he is to be permitted to take his fill, as if they were his own, whether he be of the countrey, or a ſtranger; who ſhall depart joyfully, in that they have been made partakers of ſuch fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carrie any away with them. *Deut.*25.4. Oxen treading or grinding. Deut 23.24. Travellers are not to be driven away from ripe fruits.

They likewiſe that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taſte of them, as they bear them to the Preſſe: for it is an unjuſt thing, that the goods which are given by the will
B of God for the ſuſtenance of man, ſhould be denied them, that deſire to taſte the fruit which God giveth in due ſeaſon, and muſt ſuddenly paſſe away.

They likewiſe are to be invited, that through ſhame make nice to touch the ſame, yea, and to be entreated to take part (if they be Iſraelites) for ſuch are companions and maſters, in that they are of the ſame race: and if they travell into any place, they ought to be entreated to take part of thoſe benefits which God preſented unto them, according to the ſeaſon. For it is not to be ſuppoſed, that that is ill imployed, which in way of courteſie a man permitteth another man to take, ſince it is God that furniſheth and giveth the abundance and foiſon of all things; not to the end to enjoy them in private, but alſo to beſtow them willingly. And he it is, that by this means, would declare unto other people the good will he beareth to the people of Iſrael, and the felicitie whereof he maketh them partakers; by reaſon, that in that
C abundance which they have, his will is, that other men ſhould have part thereof. But if it be proved that she hath been deflowred, and hath been common, then shall she be stoned to death, for that she hath not chastly conserved her virginitie, till the time of her lawfull marriage; and if she be of the race of the Priests, she shall be burned alive. *Deut.*21.15, 16,17. The first begotten should hold his right.

If any man have two wives, the one of which he holdeth in great honour and amity, either for love, or by reason of her beautie, and that the other be not in the like condition, and estimate; if the sonne of her that is born be loved, demandeth to have the prerogative of the elder, which is two portions of that which cometh to all the rest by his fathers patrimonie, (for so much import our Ordinances) and challengeth the same, by reason that his fathers more dearly loveth his mother then the other, let it not be granted him. For it is an act against justice, that the eldest should be deprived of that which appertaineth unto him, because his mothers condition is inferior to that of the others, by reason of his fathers affection. H

The punishment of adultetie, or rather ravishing. *Deut.*22.23, 24.

Whosoever shall violate a maiden, being betrothed to another man, (if by perswasion she hath consented to lie with him) let her die with him; for they are both of them equally guiltie of sinne: the man, because he hath perswaded the maiden to suffer an insufferable dishonour, and to preferre her lust before an honest marriage; and the maid, for suffering her self to be overcome, and abandoning her bodie to villanie, either for lust, or lucre sake. But if meeting her alone, he enforce her, and she have none to succour her hard by; let him die alone.

v.25. The deflowring of a virgin.

He, that shall deflowre the virgin that is unmarried, he shall take her to wife: but if he condiscend not to the father, to entertain her in wedlock, he shall pay fiftie Sicles, for amends of the injurie. I

If any man pretend to separate himself from his wife for certain causes, such as ordinarily happen amongst married couples, let him confirm it in writing, That he will never more entertain her again; and so may she marry again unto another, and refuse the former husband: and if it happened that she were evill entreated by the second, or that he being dead, the first would take her again in marriage, it is not lawfull for the wife to return unto him.

*Deut.*25.5. ad 9 The wife of the dead brother married.

If the brother of him that is deceased without issue, take to wife her whom his deceased brother had married, and that the sonne which was born by his second wedlock, beareth his name, let him be brought up as the successour of his inheritance, (which thing is granted for publique profit sake, to the end that families should not come to ruine, and that the goods should remain to those of the same kindred.) Furthermore, it is allowed for the comfort of afflicted women, that they may be joyned in marriage with the next akinne of their first husbands. But if the brother will not take her to wife, she shall repair unto the Senate, and make this protestation, That the brother of her deceased husband will not entertain her, (although she had desired to remain in that line, and bring forth infants unto him) protesting, that by him onely the memorie of her deceased husband was dishonoured. And when the Senate shall have examined the cause, why he estrangeth himself from this marriage, his excuse shall be allowed of, how great or slight consequence soever it be; and then shall the widow unloose his shoe, and spit in his face, and tell him, that he hath deservedly suffered these things, in that he hath injured the memorie of his dead brother. And thus shall he depart out of the Court, being defamed for his whole life time, and the woman may marrie whomsoever she list. K L

Marriage with a bond woman. *Deut.*21 11, 12,13.

If any man take a virgin prisoner, or such a one as hath been alreadie married, and be desirous to take her to his wife, it is not lawfull for him to touch or approach her, before such time as she hath been shaven, and (having put on her mourning apparell) hath bewailed her parents, or friends slain in battell: but after she hath in this sort asswaged her sorrow, she may afterwards addict her self to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honest and just, that he that entertaineth her, to have issue by her, should condiscend unto her will, in all that wherein he might gratifie her, and that he should not onely addict himself to the pursuit of his pleasure. When as then the thirtie dayes of mourning shall be expired, (for that time is sufficient for the wife to bewail her friends in) then may she hearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleasure with her, it fortune that he mislike her, and will not accept her for his wife, he can no more make her his slave, but she may go whither-soever she pleaseth, for that she beareth with her, her libertie. Eunuchs are to be deteſted, and their companies to be fled, becauſe they deprive themſelves of Manhood, and the gift of begetting Children, which God hath given unto men, for the encreaſe of mankind. Such people therefore are to be driven far from us, and eſteemed wholly inexcuſable, who kill their children before they be born. For it is a matter very manifeſt, that their ſpirits being effeminate, their bodies alſo are degenerate. Each thing alſo that is monſtrous to behold, is to be driven away: neither is it lawful

God grant, that you may enjoy the countrey (which he hath given you) in contempt of
C travels, and in exerciſe of vertues: and that you may poſſeſs the ſame in ſecurity and peace; and that ſtrangers may not leavie armies, to overthrow you: and that no civil mutiny may be raiſed amongſt you, which may bring to paſs, that that which hath been well ordered and decreed by your anceſtors, do come to nought, when you ſhall happen to commit the contrary. Live therefore, and perſiſt you to conform your ſelves to thoſe Laws, which both God hath approved for good, and hath alſo given you. But if perhaps your ſelves at this preſent, or your ſucceſſours hereafter, ſhall fortune to entertain and undertake a Warre, God grant it may happen without the confines of your countrey: but if the matter muſt needs be tried out by the ſword, you ſhall ſend certain Heraulds to your deſtinated enemies. D fore you enter battel, it ſhall be requiſite firſt of all to parley with them, and to declare unto them, that you have a great Army, and horſes, and weapons, and (beſides all theſe) that you have Gods favour and aſſiſtance; who ſhall require them therefore, that you may not be enforced to war againſt them, not to make booty of their goods, and to carry them away, in ſpight of their reſiſt. If they condiſcend unto any reaſonable conditions, then entertain peace; making your account, that they are ſtronger then you be: but if they will needs offer you injury, you ſhall lead forth your Army againſt them, having God for your General, and ſoveraign Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your ſelves have choſen, ſurpaſſing all the reſt in valour. For whereas there are divers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought neceſſarily and readily to be executed, is hindered; and commonly the iſſue is unfortunate, where there are divers Commanders. Let your Army be generally levied of

Let them alſo be free from War, who having built them a new houſe, have not enjoyed the ſame for a years ſpace; as alſo he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and beſides theſe, he that hath wedded a wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his houſe: leſt being tranſported with the deſire of theſe things, and reſerving themſelves to their forſaken pleaſures, in the behalf of their wives, they fight but faintly and coldly.

Some few dayes after (for he aſſembled the people ſix dayes, one after the other) he gave them his bleſſing, and pronounced his maledictions againſt thoſe which ſhould not live according to his laws, but ſhould tranſgreſſe the determinations therof: He read alſo unto them a Poem of ſix meaſures (which he had enregiſtred in the holy book) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things have and do fall out, without varying any wayes from the truth and veritie. Theſe volumes and the Ark, gave he unto the Prieſts; in which he alſo placed the ten Commandments written in the two tables. He committed alſo unto them the cuſtodie of the Tabernacle. He likewiſe exhorted the people that (at ſuch time as by force they had conquered the promiſed countrey, and were planted therein) they ſhould not forget the injurie which the Amalechites had done unto them, but that they ſhould lead forth their armie againſt them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at ſuch time, as they were in the deſart. And commanded them that as ſoon as they had taken the countrey of Canaan, they ſhould exterminate and extinguiſh all the people.

Deut. 25.19. The Amalechites to be puniſhed.

He willed them alſo to erect an Altar towards the riſing of the Sunne (not farre from the citie of Sichem, between two mountains, the one Garizim, on the right hand; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that diſtributing the people into two parts (ſix Tribes in every part) they ſhould plant them on the mountains. And he commanded that the Levites, and Prieſts ſhould be with them, to the intent that they firſt of all that were upon the mountain of Garizim, ſhould beſeech God, that he would multiply his bleſſings upon them that ſhould be zealous of his ſervice, and careful of the conſervation of his laws, without diverting from that which Moſes had commanded. The ſix other alſo were appointed to anſwer the like: and when as likewiſe theſe ſix laſt had prayed, the ſix firſt were to anſwer them, and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions againſt the tranſgreſſours (each one anſwering the other) in ratification of that which had been ſpoken. He reduced alſo under writing theſe bleſſings and curſes, to the intent that the memory thereof might never be ſuppreſſed or extinguiſhed by time: which he alſo (being neer unto his death) cauſed to be written in the Altar on the one ſide thereof, in that part which extended it ſelf toward the place where the people ſtood, at ſuch time as they ſacrificed and offered burnt-offerings. Since which day there were no more ſacrifices offered in that place: becauſe it was contrary to law. This did Moſes eſtabliſh, and theſe the Hebrew Nation obſerve continually and inviolably, even unto this day.

Deut. 29.1. ad 10. Moſes bindeth the Hebrews by an oath to keep the law.

On the next morrow, he reaſſembled all the people, themſelves, their wives, and children: he likewiſe commanded, that the ſlaves ſhould be there preſent, binding them by an oath that they ſhould maintain and keep the laws, and that diligently tying themſelves to the will of God, they ſhould not ſo much eſteem either their kinred, or means, or perils, or any other cauſe whatſoever, as that thereby they ſhould be driven to neglect their laws, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether it were any one of their kindred, or any city whatſoever, that would ſeek to alter and diſturb the ſame, or ſtrive to weaken the eſtate thereof, that both in particular and in publick, they ſhould expoſe themſelves and endeavour to puniſh them: and if they ſhould fortune to take ſuch a City, that they ſhould raze and utterly deface the ſame; and if it were poſſible, not to leave one ſtone upon another, but to deſtroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take ſuch a revenge, yet, that they ſhould make it known, that they were not conſenting to their impiety. Hereunto the whole multitude ſubſcribed, and ſealed it with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people ſhould know when the ſacrifices were agreeable unto God, and how they ought to march out to battell, taking a ſign of the ſtones of which I have fore-ſpoken.

Joſuah likewiſe, during the life and in the preſence of Moſes, fore-prophecied whatſoever he intended to perform for the profit of the people, either abroad in the adminiſtration of war, or at home in preſcribing laws: and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly preſcribed them) he told them, that by inſtructions from God he fore-prophecied, that if they violated their countrey Religion, they ſhould not eſcape their deſtruction; for that both their countrey ſhould be filled with forraign arms, and their cities ſackt, and their Temple burnt, and that they themſelves ſhould be ſold under the ſpear, and that they ſhould ſerve a nation, which would not be moved or touched with commiſeration of their afflictions and miſeries; and, that at length, they ſhould too lately and unprofitably repent them of their errour: yet, that God, their eſtabliſher, ſhould reſtore cities to the citizens, and a Temple to his people: And that it ſhould come to paſs, that they ſhould not loſe this only one time, but alſo very many times. Then did Moſes alſo exhort Jeſus, that he ſhould lead his army againſt the Canaanites, promiſing him, that God would be aſſiſtant in his actions, prophecying beſides, much good hap unto the people.

Whileſt Moſes pronounced theſe his laſt words, and diſcourſed unto the Tribes their ſeverall deſtinies, the whole multitude brake into tears; and the women beating their breaſts, ſhewed and expreſſed the ſorrow they had conceived at his death. The children likewiſe lamented, making it known that they could not be maſters of their own ſorrow, becauſe that in their tender years they had underſtood the vertue and famous acts of Moſes; and betwixt
C the elder and younger ſort, there was as it were a conflict who ſhould weep more bitterly: for the one underſtanding of how worthy a Governour they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, becauſe they ſhould then forſake him, before they had ſufficiently taſted and made trial how great his vertue was. But how great the compaſſion and complaint of the people was, a man may make conjecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For although he were aſſuredly perſwaded, that a man was not to lament upon the inſtant of his death (in that it chanced unto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and reſtrain himſelf from tears: And whileſt he was born thither where he vaniſhed out of their ſight, all of them followed him, wetting their faces and boſomes with flowing tears. Then
D did Moſes (beckning with his hand) warn them from a far off, that they ſhould ſtand ſtill and keep their places, and exhorted them that were neareſt him, by word of mouth, that they ſhould not follow nor proſecute him any further with tears, for fear leaſt they ſhould make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth, and Eleazar the high Prieſt, and the chieftain Jeſus. And when he was arrived upon the mountain called Abarim (which is very high, and ſcituate near unto Jericho, and from whence he might diſcover the greater part of the land of Canaan) he diſmiſſed the Elders, and whileſt with mutuall embraces he took his laſt leave of Eleazar and Jeſus, and diſcourſed with them, a cloud ſuddenly environed him, and he was taken away into a certain valley: but in the Scripture
E he writeth that he died, fearing leſt for the excellency of his vertue, they might report that he was raviſhed and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundred and twenty years, the third part whereof he ſpent in government (one moneth onely exempted.) He died the laſt moneth of the year, and the firſt day of that moneth which the Macedonians call Dyſtrus; and our countrimen Adar. Of all men the wiſeſt that ever was, and who in execution of his good counſels had no man to equall him. Moreover in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertain and perſwade the people, he had no ſecond: and ſo were his affections alwayes levelled and limited by his wiſedome that he ſeemed utterly to want them, and that onely he knew the names of thoſe paſſions which he perceived to be too active in other men. In his government he was matchleſs, in his prophecies peerleſs, ſo that all the Orations that he made, ſeemed to be Oracles. For which cauſe the F whole multitude mourned for him during the term of thirty dayes: neither were the Hebrews ever ſeized with ſo extreme grief, as they were at that time, when the Prophet died; neither did he onely leave behind him a preſent deſire of him, but a great eſtimation amongſt all men, who have ever chanced to read and examine his writings, whileſt by them they make eſtimate of his vertues. And theſe are thoſe things which I thought good to be ſpoken of the death of Moſes.

How Jesus, Generall of the Hebrews, having overcome and slain the Canaanites, divided their Land amongst the Tribes by Lot. Josua. 2.

Jesus sendeth Spies into Jericho. Josua. 2. 1, 2, 3.

After that Moses had been taken from amongst men (after the manner as I have declared) and that all whatsoever he had ordained, was duely performed, and his funerall obsequies were at an end; Jesus commanded the people to prepare themselves, and to march forward into battell. He L sent Espialls likewise into Jericho, who might both sound their minds, and discover their forces. Presently after he dislodged, and encamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to pass the River of Jordan, as soon as any opportunitie offered it self. Then assembled he altogether the Princes of the Tribes of Ruben and Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasses, (for to this half Tribe the countrey of the Amorites was given for an habitation; which was the seventh part of Canaan) and remembred them of that which they had promised unto Moses, intreating them (in memory and favour of him, who in the last period of his life was not wearied to take care of their Common-weal and publick profit) speedily and willingly to perform that which they had promised unto him. Who shewing themselves ready and willing to perform that which he M commanded them, he armed and arranged fiftie thousand men, that were his followers; and afterwards departing from the City of Abila) he drew towards Jordan, and marched forward some sixty furlongs. As soon as he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and presented themselves unto him, certifying him of the whole estate of the Canaanites. For being unknown and unsuspected, upon the first arrivall they observed and viewed the walls and strength of the Citie at their pleasure, searching which of them were more or lesse defenced, and which of the gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of those that met them, offer any offence unto them: whilest they thus pryed into,

A and viewed every place, the Citizens interpreted their diligence to be rather an accuſtomed curioſity of ſtrangers, then ſuſpected them that they intended any hoſtile ſtratagem.

The year of the world 2493. before Chriſts Nativity, 1470.

About the ſhutting in of the evening, they retired themſelves into a certan hoſtrie that adjoyned the wals, into which they had been directed to take their repaſt, and whileſt after ſupper time they conſulted upon their return, the King was given to underſtand (as he ſate at his ſupper) that certain Spies ſent out of the Hebrews camp had ſurveyed the city, and taken up their lodging in Rahabs houſe, where they ſuppoſed to conceal themſelves till they might gain them opportunity to depart. Whereupon the King ſent a ſpeedy commandment and officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, he might by torture extort from them the cauſe and reaſon why they came into his city. Of whoſe approach,

v. 4, 6. Rahab hideth the Spies.

B when Rahab had gotten ſome private intelligence, ſhe hid the Spies under certain packs of linnen, which ſhe dried neer unto the walls, and told them that were ſent by the king, that certain ſtrange gueſts a little before Sunne-ſet had ſupt in her houſe, but that they were departed, who if they were ſuſpected by the king as ſuch, as intended any detriment to the Common-weal, they might with little labour and purſuit be eaſily ſurpriſed in their way. They hearing the woman ſpeak after this manner, and imagining no ſubtiltie or deceit in her; returned back again without ſearching the hoſtrie. But after they were buſied and travelled in the purſuit and ſearch after them every way, and tracting of everie path, whereby they might be ſuſpected to travell towards Jordan, and perceiving no ſigne of their flight, they deſiſted anie further to purſue them. No ſooner was the tumult appeaſed, but Rahab

C calleth forth the Spies and told them the dangers to which ſhe had expoſed her ſelf for their ſecuritie ſake (for had ſhe been convinced to have concealed them, ſhe might by no means have eſcaped the puniſhment of the king, but that both ſhe and all her family had miſerably periſhed:) She therefore required them, that at ſuch time as they ſhould be Lords of the countrie of Canaan, and had both the occaſion and power to requite her courteſies, that they would have her in remembrance. This ſaid, ſhe diſmiſſed them (to the end they might return home again.) But before their departure ſhe took an oath of them, to warrantize both her ſelf, and all that which appertained unto her, at ſuch time as they ſhould become maſters of the Citie, and had deſtroyed all the citizens thereof, according to the arreſt and ſentence

D given againſt them; which ſhe knew ſhould come to paſſe, having certain apprehenſion of the ſame, by certain ſignes and tokens from God: whereupon for the preſent with many thankſgivings they proteſted, and for the future avowed and ſwore unto her, to acknowledge her kindneſſe not in words, but in deeds. At ſuch time therefore as ſhe ſhould perceive that the City was ready to be ſurpriſed, they counſelled her that ſhe ſhould retire all her ſubſtance, and all thoſe that appertained unto her, into her houſe; and that before the door thereof, ſhe ſhould ſpread ſome crimſon garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiving the ſame, might inhibite the ſouldiers from pillaging and ſpoyling her houſe: For (ſaid they) we will give him notice hereof (by reaſon of that willing forwardneſſe that hath been in thee

E to ſave our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy friends die in the combate, do not impute the fault unto us; and we beſeech God (by whom we have ſworn) that he be not diſpleaſed againſt any of us; except againſt ſuch as falſifie their oaths. Having after this manner accorded upon the covenant, they let down one another from the wall; and when they were arrived in ſafety among their nation, they recounted unto them all that which had hapned ſince their arrivall in the city, Joſuah hereupon declared unto Eleazar the high Prieſt and the reſt of the Elders, what oath his Spies had ſworn unto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promiſe they had made. But the Generall was penſive and ſore troubled, for that he knew not which way he might paſſe the river of Jordan by reaſon that for the preſent it was very deep and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon; and if they would have built one, the enemie would have interrupted them: and further beſides that,

Ieſu. 3. 1, 2, 3. Jeſus paſſeth Jordan with his army.

F there were not any places convenient to ſtay in. But God made him a promiſe that he would make the waters fall, and give them paſſage there-through. Joſuah therefore encamped his hoſt for the term of two daies (to the end he might paſſe over his whole army, and the reſt of the people, after this manner following.) The Prieſts marched before with the Ark. After them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and thoſe veſſells which were deſtinated for ſacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, diſtinguiſhed in their Tribes, having incloſed within their battels the women and children whereby they might be the more ſecure from the force of the flood. But when as the Prieſts had marched formoſt, and found the river paſſable, and that the water was decreaſed, and that the current thereof was not ſo violent, neither the billows ſo incenſed, but that in the bottome there was good footing

The year of the world, 2494. before Christs Nativity, 1470.

(for that the gravell and sand was not quick but settled) then all of them without fear passed over the foord, finding all things assuredly performed unto them, which God had fore-prophesied and promised unto them: but the Priests kept them in the midst of the channel untill the multitude were past over, and were in security; and when as every one had gotten the other bank, the Priests issued out, permitting the river to flow according to his free and ordinary course: which pleasantly flowing, grew to that greatnesse and swiftnesse which it retained at the first. Now when the Hebrews had marched fifty furlongs, they encamped themselves some ten furlongs from Jericho. But Jesus builded an altar of stones (which every one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Jordan, according as the Prophet had commanded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigious restrainment of the flood, and on the same he sacrificed unto God, and the solemnity of the Paschal was celebrated in that place; and at that time they, who in times past were in great necessity, were largely furnished with all plenty and abundance, for they did reap the corn of the Canaanites (which at that time was ripe) and carried away the rest for a prey. In the same season likewise their nourishment of Manna failed them, whereon they had fed for the space of fourtie yeers. And whereas the Israelites did all these things with security and freely, and the Canaanites never sallied out against them, but appauled with fear, shut themselves up within their walls: Jesus decreed and resolved to besiege them in their cities: so that on the first day of the feast, the Priests bearing the Ark, and guarded on every side with troops of armed men, drew near unto the Citie, sounding their seven horns: and exhorting their souldiers to behave themselves manfully, they walked about and invironed the walls round about, being attended both by the Senate and Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their horns, and so returned back into their camp. Which when they had done for the space of six dayes, on the seventh Josuah assembled the armie and all the people, bringing them joyfull news of the city, which that day should be surprised without labour (the walls falling down of their own accord, and without mans hand, and yeelding them free passage and entrance into the Citie) and he encouraged them to kill all those whom they met withall, and not to give over the slaughter of their enemies, although they were wearie, neither to be moved with compassion, nor allured from the slaughter and execution by desire of prey, or to permit the enemy in any sort to flie, but that they should extinguish and root out all that which breathed and had life, reserving nothing for prey or private profit. He commanded likewise that all that which was found (either of gold or silver) should be brought into one place, and reserved to be the first-fruits of the happy works of God; and after the surprisall first of the Citie, that onely Rahab with her kindred should be saved, by reason of the oaths which the spies had sworn unto her. This said, he arranged his host, and made them approach the Citie, then did they once more walk round about the Citie, the Ark marching before them, & encouraging the army to valour by the sound of their cornets. And after they had environed the walls seuen times, and had a little reposed themselves, the walls fell (whereas then neither the Hebrews had enforced any engine against them, or used any other violence.) So that they entring into the Citie, slue all those that were therein, who were already discomforted by the sudden and unexpected overthrow of their walls, and thorow their sudden fear made unapt to fight, so that they were slain amidst their streets, finding neither refuge nor relief to succour them: yea so were they fleshed in the slaughter, that they neither spared women nor children, but filled the city with dead carcasses, which at length being set on fire, served them for a funerall flame to consume them in, and with equall fury ravaged and burnt the fields. Onely Rahab and her household (who kept themselves within her hostrie) were saved by the spies: who brought to Josuahs presence, he gave her thanks for saving his spies, and promised her that he would reward her courtesies, and anon after gave her possessions, and ever after held her in great honour. All that of the Citie which the fire spared, the sword consumed. And Josuah pronounced curses against those, who should afterward endeavour to erect that which he had ruinated: namely, that he that should lay the first foundation, should be deprived of his first begotten sonne, and he that should finish the work, might lose his youngest sonne; neither pleased it God that this imprecation should be frustrate, as hereafter it shall be spoken. At the surprise and sack of this Citie, there was gathered an infinite quantitie of gold, silver, and brasse; so that no man brake the edict, or sought any prey or lucre thereby for himself. These spoils Jesus delivered unto the Priests, to be laid up in the treasurie, and after this manner was the City of Jericho destroyed. But Achar the sonne of Zebel of the tribe of Juda, having gotten a royall pall altogether embrodered with gold, with an ingot of gold of three hundreth Sicles in weight, and thinking in himself that

A that it were a very fond thing, that the profit he had made by the hazzard of his life, ſhould be taken from him and preſented unto God, who had no need thereof, digged a deep pit in his tent, and buried his ſpoiles therein, thinking by this means to defraud God, and deceive his companions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal (which ſignifieth Enfranchized, becauſe that having paſt the river Jordan, they knew that they ſhould be delivered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penury of the deſart.) But ſome few dayes after the deſtruction of Jericho, Ioſuah ſent out three thouſand armed men againſt Ainan (a Citie ſituate a little above Jericho) who encountering with the Ainites in battell, and by them put to flight, loſt thirty and ſixe of their company. The news of which diſaſter being brought into the campe, the Iſraelites were ſeized with exceeding griefe, not
B onely for the men they had loſt (which were all of them valiant men and worthy of honour) but alſo by reaſon of the deſpaire they conceived of their future ſucceſſe. For being already perſwaded that they were maſters of the field, and that their army ſhould be alwayes warranted and ſafe at ſuch time as they ſhould fight (according as before times God had promiſed them) they ſaw (contrary to their opinion) that their adverſaries had taken heart; inſomuch as clothing themſelves in ſackcloth upon their raiments, they ſpent all the day in teares and lamentations without taſting any meat; ſo grievouſly were they afflicted with the inconvenience that had hapned. But Ioſuah perceiving the armie diſcomfited after this manner, and conceiving ſome ſiniſter hope of their eſtates, boldly addreſſed himſelfe unto God, ſaying: "
We have not been induced by our owne temeritie to attempt the conqueſt of this land by " force, but we have been hereunto incouraged by thy ſervant Moſes, to whom thou haſt pro- " C miſed by divers ſignes, that thou wouldeſt give us this countrey to inhabit in, and that our " army ſhould have alwayes the upper hand in battell, and of theſe thy promiſed we have of- " tentimes experimented the event. But now beyond all expectation (having received an o- " verthrow and loſt ſome of our ſouldiers) being terrified by this accident, and ſuſpicious of " thy promiſes to Moſes, we both abſtaine from war, and (after ſo many enterprizes and en- " trances of war) we cannot hope of any fortunate or ſucceſſull proceedings. Be thou therefore " affiſtant unto us, O Lord (for it lyeth in thy power) and by thy mercy relieve our preſent ſorrow with a largeſſe of victory, and take from us the thought of deſpaire wherein we are too far plunged. Ioſuah lying proſtrate on his face, made this prayer unto God, who preſent-D ly anſwered him, that he ſhould ariſe; commanding him to purge the armie of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude, who was ſo hardy as to violate and conceale thoſe things which were conſecrated unto him, aſſuring him that that cauſe was the means of the preſent calamitie: but that as ſoone as he had ſearched out, and puniſhed the ſacriledge, the Iſraelites ſhould become fortunate and obtaine the victory. This Oracle Ioſuah declared unto the people, and calling for the high Prieſt and the Magiſtrates, he caſt lots upon the tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Iuda, it was again caſt by kinreds; and when again the ſacriledge was found to be committed in Zacharias kinred, they examined the ſame once more man by man, and found out Achar: who having no means to deny the ſame, and being diſcovered by God himſelf, confeſſed the fact,
E and brought forth thoſe things, which he had concealed: Whereupon being preſently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deſerved it. But Ioſuah having purified the people, led them forth againſt Ainan, and laying an Ambuſcado by night time above the citie, early in the morning he drew the enemie out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being encouraged by their former victory) but Ioſuah making a ſhew of retreat, drew them father off from their Citie (forming in them an imaginarie hope that the Iſraelites fled, and that they ſhould gaine a ſecond victory over them.) But when Ioſuah ſodainly made a ſtand, and freſhly charged them, and gave a ſignall unto thoſe that lay in ambuſh, they were incontinently addreſſed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entred the gates of the Citie, on the wals whereof there ſtood divers of the inhabitants, being F eye-witneſſes (as they thought) of their atchieved victory. In this manner was the citie taken, and all they that were therein, were ſlaine: and Ioſuah on the other ſide inforced thoſe in ſuch manner (with whom he maintained skirmiſh) that they turned their backs, end fled towards the Citie, as if it had been in the ſame eſtate as they left it: but when they perceived that it was ſurprized, and ſaw both it, their wives, and children conſumed with fire, they ſcattered themſelves about the fields, not being able to rally themſelves, by reaſon of their diſturbance and diſorder. After this overthrow of the Ainites, there were a great number of women, children, and bondſlaves taken captive, and ſtore of all ſorts of mooveables. The Hebrews alſo became Lords of much cattell, and gathered a great quantitie of ſilver (for the countrey countrey was rich.) All which Iosuah (upon his return to Galgal distributed amongst the souldiers. But the Gabeonites (who dwelt not farre off from Jerusalem) understanding what had hapned to them of Hiericho (and seeing the estate of the Ainites, and fearing lest the like misfortune might fall upon them) thought it not good to offer treaties of peace to Iosuah, supposing they should finde no tolerable conditions at his hands, because they knew that he warred under that resolution, utterly to roote out and extinguish the nation of the Canaanites from off the earth. They therefore made a league with the Cepherites, and Cathierimites their neighbours, telling them that they should not escape the danger, if so be it fell out that the Gabeonites were first taken by the Israelites: but that if they were united together, they might both resist the greatnesse, and avoid the danger of them. Which counsell of theirs being accepted, they sent Embassadors unto Iosuah (such men as they thought to be both most capable and wisest amongst them in the affaires of Common-weale (to the intent to entreat a peace betwixt them and the Israelites; who knowing that it would be very dangerous for them, if they should say that they were Canaanites; and that on the contrary side, they should avoid the danger, if they protested that they had no community or alliance with them, but that they dwelled far off from them; told Iosuah, that (being incited by his fame) they had undertaken a long journey, the truth wherof he might conjecture by their habits for upon their setting forth their garments were new, and now by their long journey quite worne (for they had purposely put upon them old raiment, to the end it might be sutable to their subtile insinuation.) Standing up therefore in the middest of the multitude (attired after this manner) they told them that they were sent by the Gabeonites, and the neighbouring Cities there abouts (farre disjoyned from that countrey) to articulate and ratifie a peace between them, according as they have been accustomed to proceed in their accords: For knowing well that the countrey of Canaan was given unto them by the grace and gratuitie of God (to the end they should be masters and possessours thereof) they were much rejoyced thereat, and required them to be received as their confederates. By these words, and tokens of their garments, and intimation of their long journey, they perswaded the Hebrews to enter and accord an amitie with them. And the high Priest Eleazar with the councell of the Elders sware unto them, that they should be reputed for friends and allies, and that no unjust action should be enterprized against them; the people likewise approved their oathes. But Iosuah encamping with his Armie upon their confines, and understanding that the Gabeonites dwelt not far off from Jerusalem, and that they likewise were of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principall and princes among them, and complained and upbraided them of their deceit: whereunto they answered, that they had no other meanes to procure their safetie and securitie, and for that cause (and their necessitie sake) that they had sought their refuge thereby. Whereupon he called unto him Eleazar the high Priest and the Councell of the Elders, who told him that he might not infringe the oath which they had made unto them, but that he might depute them to serve the publike ministeries. whereupon they were adjudged to attend on these services: and by this meanes delivered they themselves from their imminent perill. But for that the King of Jerusalem was sore incensed against the Gabeonites (for that they had revolted and submitted to Iesus) he assembled together the kings of his neighbour nations, to make warre against them. The Gabeonites perceiving the danger they were in, and how the enemie was prepared to assault them (and how to that intent they had pitched their tents neere unto a certain fountain not far off from the Citie) they required Iesus to assist and defend them. For their affaires were in that estate, that they expected death from the hands of their friends: and contrariwise hoped for helpe to be warranted by those Hebrews, with whom they had contracted amitie (notwithstanding that they arrived in that countrey to destroy the whole nation of the Canaanites. Iosuah therefore (hastning onward with his whole army to give them assistance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the enemie (at such time as he intended his assault) and having put them to flight, he pursued them by a steepie tract, which place is called Bethora, where he knew that God had fought for him (as it appeared manifestly by the thunder, lightning and haile that fell at that time, farre bigger then was accustomed.) The day likewise (the like whereof was never heard of before) was lengthened, lest by the speedy approach of the night the enemie should escape from the victor: whereupon it came to passe that Iesus took all those five Kings in a certaine cave neere Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to the death. And that the day at that time increased above common custome, it is extant and registred in the sacred volumes, which are reserved in the Temple. When after this manner the Kings that invaded the Gabeonites were slain and conquered, Iesus led his Armie into the mountaines of Canaan, where having made a

a great slaughter of men, and taken a rich booty; he brought back his Armie into Gilgal.

A Now, when the renown of the Hebrews valiant acts, and the admirable number of those that were slaughtered, were buried and scattered far and near amongst the neighbour Nations, they were surprized with a sudden fear: so that the Kings of the Canaanites, that bordered upon Libanus, and they also of the Plain of Chanaan, joyned themselves confederates with the Palestines, and all of them were incensed against them, and encamped near unto Berotha, (a Citie of the higher Galilee, not far from Cedesa, which is also situate in the land of Canaan.) The whole Army of them consisted of three hundred thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and twentie thousand Chariots. This great multitude of the enemy astonished Josuah, and the Israelites, and by reason of the assured fear wherewith they were seized) they conceived but little hope of obtaining the upper hand: but God reproached him

B and upbraided him of that his timiditie, and for that they suspected themselves to be scarcely secured under his protection, he promised them likewise, that he would overcome their enemies, and make their Horses unprofitable, and would consume their Chariots by fire. Josuah therefore was emboldned by these promises from God, and marched out against his enemies; whom he surprised on the fifth day. The encounter was strong, and the slaughter so great, that they who should but hear the same, would scarcely believe it. Many also were slain in the pursuit; so that (a few onely excepted) the whole Army was put to the sword. The Kings also were all of them slain; and of their men, there remained not any one alive. Josuah also commanded that their Horses should be slain, and he burned their Chariots, and securely

C marched thorow the whole Countrey; so that no man durst sally out, or make head against him. He besieged likewise their strong places, and killed all those whom he might apprehend. Now, when the fifth year was fully finished, and not any one of the Canaanites were left alive, (except such as were fled into their Cities and Forts of defences) Josuah once more retired his Camp towards the mountains, and placed the sacred Tabernacle in the Citie of Siloe, which seemed to be a very convenient place, by reason of the beautie of the same; where the Ark might remain, till such time as their affairs of estate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he departed with all the people, to repair unto Sichem; and there builded he an Altar in that place, (according as before time Moses had commanded and enjoyned) and having divided his Army, he planted the half of them on the mountain of Garizim, and the other half on the mountain of Gebal (on which also there is an Altar) with the

D Levites and the Priests: and after they had sacrificed and done there execrations, and ingraven them on the Altars, they returned into Siloe. Now, insomuch as Josuah was well stricken in yeers, and very well perceived, that the Cities of the Canaanites were hardly to be assaulted, both in respect of the places wherein they were scituate, as also for the munitions wherewith (besides other advantages of nature) there walls were strengthned and fortified (for the Canaanites having intelligence of the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, and how they hastned thither-ward, to the intent utterly to extinguish and overthrow that Nation, spent all that time in defencing and fortifying their Cities) he assembled all the people in Siloe; where when with mutuall and frequent concourse) they were assembled, he

E declared unto them the happie success which (till that time) had befallen them, and the brave executions, worthy (in their events) to challenge God for their Authour; furthermore, the excellencie of the Ordinances under which they lived: alleadging, that the 31 Kings which had been so hardy as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them been overcome; that all the Army that had undertaken to overthrow them in battell, was wholly discomfited, so that there remained not any memory of them. But for that certain of the Cities were taken, and the rest better fenced (and for this cause more obstinate) had need of a longer assault and expugnation, he thought good that they (who had been drawn from out the Country, scituate beyond Jordan to be Associates in this common cause of Conquest, and by reason of affinity had made themselves copartners and companions in their perils) should be sent back into their own Countrey, with all complement of thanks and

F gratuitie. Afterwards, that some one of each Tribe of approved uprightness and loyaltie, should be pickt out, who levying out and surveying the Country, might faithfully and without fraud, report the greatness thereof. This sentence was approved by the whole multitude; and thereupon divers men were sent (accompanied with such as were skilfull in Geometrie, who in respect of their Science, could neither erre, nor be deceived) to measure out the Land, according to the goodness thereof. For the nature of the Land of Canaan is such, that there are great Plaines very fruitfull, and which being (compared with other places) might be esteemed happy and fruitfull in all sorts of Fruit; but if they be compared with the other Countreyes of Jericho, and the Land about Jerusalem, they seem to be nothing worth:

Iosuah 13.19. Josuah divideth the Region of Canaan to the nine Tribes, and the half Tribe of Manasses.

Then Josuah (taking unto him Eleazar with the Elders, and Princes of the Tribes) divided the Region amongst nine tribes; and the half part of the tribe of Manasses (having an unpartiall respect of the greatness of every tribe) and when as each mans lot was cast, there fell to Judahs part all the higher Judæa (which extendeth it self in length even unto Jerusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; to which likewise were annexed the Cities of Ascalon and Gaza.) The tribe of Simeon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumæa, continuing upon Egypt and Arabia. The Benjamites had that Countrey which extendeth from Jordan unto the Sea in length and in breadth unto Jerusalem and Bethel: and this portion was very small (by reason that the Countrey was good, for it contained the Cities of Jericho and Jerusalem. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted his portion in length, from Jordan unto Gadera; and in breadth from Bethel unto the great plain. The half tribe of the Manassites was valued from Jordan to the Citie of Dor in length, and in breadth unto Bethsan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Isachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Jordan, for the limits and terms of his length, and the mountain Itobir for the bounds of his breadth. I The Zabulonites were allowed that Countrey, which stretcheth out as far as Genazereth, and that abutteth on the mountain Carmel, and the Sea. The Countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adjudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprized the Citie of Arce, which is also called Actipus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth out from the East unto the Citie of Damascus, and the lower Galilee as far as the mountain of Libanus, and the head of Jordan, that issueth from the same, on that side where are the borders of the Citie of Arce on the North side. To them of Dan was assigned the valley that is extended to the Westward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the Countrey of Jamnia and Gitta, from Abaron even unto that mountain where beginneth the Tribe of Juda. After this manner did Jesus divide the Countrey of six Nations (bearing the name of Canaan) and gave it in possession to nine Tribes and a half. For Ammorrhæa (so called by one of the sons of Canaan) had been already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two Tribes and a half, as I have already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Aritheans were not comprized in this division, neither was it tilled. But Jesus (seeing himself overburthened with years, and unfit to execute in his own person those counsels, which he had concluded upon; and foreseeing that the Governours of the people which should succeed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commanded every severall Tribe in particular, that (when they should possess the Countrey thus distributed amongst them) they should not L suffer any one of the race of the Canaanites to live. For Moses had before time told and perswaded them, that their securitie and the maintenance of the customes of their forefathers consisted in that one point) which he had likewise learned by his own experience. Further, that they should deliver unto the Levites thirtie and eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the Land of Amorrhæa: three of which were ordained for Cities of refuge to those that fled: (for he advised them, with all consideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them,) of the Tribe of Juda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nepthali, Cedesa: which is a place in higher Galilee. Moreover, he distributed unto them the surplusage of the prey which was very great: so that not onely in publick, but in private, they got no small quantitie of substance, for M there was so much gold, and rayment, and houshold-stuffe, and so great store of Cattell and Horses, as the number may not be comprehended. After which he assembled the whole Army, and to those that were planted on the other side of Jordan (who had born Armes with the rest, and were in number no less then fiftie thousand) he spake after this manner.

Josuahs oration to those that dwelt on the other side of Jordan, and had served with the rest.

Since God (the Father and Master of our Hebrew nation) hath given this Countrey into our possession, and hath promised, that at such time as it shall be conquered) he will continue and conserve the same in our possession, and since likewise you have willingly and forwardly assisted us in all our necessities and dangers (according to Gods command and direction) it is requisite at this present (since there remains not any further matter wherein K

A we have need to imploy you) that we dimiſſe you, and abuſe not your forwardneſſe and redineſſe any further; by reaſon we are aſſured, that if hereafter we ſhall have need of you, you will with no leſſe endeavour and willingneſſe be as induſtrious to do us kindneſſe. We therefore yeeld you hearty thanks, for that you have vouchſafed to be companions in our perils: and we require you, that you will perſevere in your mutuall benevolence, remembring you of your friends, and how you have gotten your poſſeſſions by our help, as we (by Gods favour and your aſſiſtance) have attained to this our preſent felicity. Neither have you adventured, without ſome reward of your travells: for in this your warfare you are enriched, and ſhall bear away with you a great prey both of Gold and Silver; and beſides all theſe, our benevolence and love, tied unto you with all alacritie and readineſſe, whenſoever you ſhall have cauſe to uſe us. For we have neither forgot, nor ſet light by Moſes com-
B mand, before he departed out of this life, and have ſpared no endeavour, whereby you might ally and tie our affections to you. We therefore diſmiſſe you to your own poſſeſſions, in compleat fulneſſe of your delight; praying you to remember your ſelves onely of theſe things, that you will ſuppoſe that no term can terminate our kindred: neither (by reaſon of the entercourſe of the river Jordan betwixt you and us) ſuppoſe you us to be any others then Hebrewes. For all of us (both thoſe that dwell on this ſide, and on the other ſide of Jordan) are the poſterity of Abraham; and one and the ſame God hath brought to light both yours and our progenitors; whoſe Lawes and Religion (inſtituted by Moſes) are diligently to be obſerved: for by this means, he will become our helper and favourer; as on the contrarie ſide (if we ſhall degenerate from his Statutes) he will be an enemie againſt us.
After he had ſpoken unto them after this manner, he embraced in particular all thoſe that
C were in dignitie; & in general, the whole people. This done, he ſtaied in that place; but the reſt of the whole people conveyed them onward with teares, and they departed the one from the other, with great grief and remorſe. But after that the Tribe of Ruben and of Gad, and the reſt of the Manaſſites, had paſſed over Jordan, they builded an Altar upon the bank of the River, that might ſerve for a memorial to poſteritie, and a token for the preſent, of the conjunction which they had with thoſe that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan. Bnt when the tidings hereof came unto their eares that dwelt on the further ſide of the River, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar, but notwithſtanding were ignorant of the reſpect and cauſe, they had in building it; they ſuppoſed, that ſeeking to innovate their Religion,
D they would introduce the ſervice of forrain and falſe gods. And being raſhly ſtirred up with this ſuſpition of the violation of their Religion, they put themſelves in armes, with this reſolution, to revenge themſelves of thoſe who had builded that Altar, and to take puniſhment of them, for that they had forſaken the Lawes and Ordinances of their fore-fathers. For they ſuppoſed, that they were not ſo farre to reſpect their parentage, or dignitie, (who were accuſed) as to forget the will of God, and that ſervice which was agreeable in his ſight. For which cauſe (being in this manner incenſed) they prepared themſelves to the expedition. But Joſuah and the high Prieſt Eleazar, with the reſt of the elders, reſtrained them; counſelling them, firſt of all to ſound their deliberation, and afterward, if it ſhould be appa-
E rent unto them, that they did it under a ſiniſter intent, at that time they might lawfully invade them by the ſword. Hereupon they ſent Phinees, the ſonne of Eleazar, and ten other of the moſt nobleſt among the Hebrews, as Embaſſadors unto them, to know, what the intent and reaſon was, why they had builded that Altar on the bank of Jordan.

Now, when theſe Embaſſadors had paſt the flood, and were come amongſt them, they ſummoned an aſſembly, and Phinees ſtanding up in the midſt of them, ſpake after this manner: "You have committed ſo hainous an offence (ſaith he) as there is no queſtion either to reprove or puniſh the ſame hence-forward in words: yet notwithſtanding, we have not upon the inſtant taken Armes, neither aſſaulted you in battell, or had reference or regard to the hainouſneſſe of your Crime, to the intent to puniſh you, but we have been ſent to you as Embaſſadors, (in conſideration of our alliance) and for that (as we ſuppoſe) you may be F drawn by good perſwaſions to the acknowledgement and deteſtation of your miſdeeds; to the end, that when we are informed of the cauſe that hath induced you to erect this Altar, it might not be thought, that we have head-long thruſt our ſelves into Armes againſt you, if under an holy affection you have builded the ſame: and if it appeareth otherwiſe, that the offence is juſtly imputed & grounded againſt you, we may take revenge of the ſame, according as reaſon requireth. For ſcarcely could we believe, that you (who are inwardly grounded in the knowledge of God, and who are hearers of thoſe laws which he himſelf hath given you) ſhould (ſince your departure from us, and upon your arrival in your own patri-

v. 21. The Rubenites answer. After that Phinees had finished this his oration, they that were the Peers and principals of the assembly, gave this answer in defence of the common cause: "Men and brethren, neither

"eth in you at this present a cause of suspition, we built it not to the intent to pacifie God by "sacrifices, but that it might remain as a perpetuall argument of our friendship, and might "admonish us of our countrey religion; not to the end you should suspect it were an inducti- K
"on toward the violating of Religion. And that this was the onely cause which allured and in"duced us to build the same, we onely challenge God for our faithful witnesse, (for which "cause, hereafter conceive a better opinion of us) and God forbid you should suppose us to be
"so besotted in that sinne, of which, whosoever of Abrahams posterity is guilty, and whoso-
"ever shall degenerate from the manners and customes of his forefathers, may not expiate "that Crime, without a capitall punishment. As soon as Phinees had heard these things, and praised their constancie, he returned unto Jesus, and declared all those things unto the people: who rejoycing (in that they had no occasion to levie men, nor cause of civill warre, or

BUt the Canaanites (whoſe eſtate at that time was in ſufficient ſecurity) expected them with a great hoſt about the city of Bezeca, having their army conducted by the King of that place called Adoni-Bezec, which name ſignifieth, Lord of the Bezecenites: (for Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to ſay as Lord) now theſe men promiſed unto themſelves the upper hand, by reaſon that Joſuah was deceaſed. Againſt theſe (of whom I have foreſpoken) the two tribes fought very valiantly, and ſlaying ten thouſand of them (whileſt they purſued the reſt) they took C Adoni-Bezec captive, who having his hands and feet cut off, acknowledged the divine juſtice: for he confeſſed that he had uſed ſeventy and two Kings beforetimes after the ſame manner. In this plight they conducted him near unto Jeruſalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then overranne they the Countrey, ſacking and taking the Cities, and after they had divers of them in their poſſeſſion, they beſieged Jeruſalem, and entring the lower city thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the ſword. But the higher town was very hard to be aſſaulted (by reaſon of the fortreſſes and ſtrength of the walles, and the naturall and ſtrong ſituation of the place) which was the cauſe that they levied their camp to go and beſiege Hebron, which they took, and ſlew all thoſe that were therein. In D that time there were ſome remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in ſtature, and unlike unto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be ſeen as yet at this day, which for their hugeneſſe ſurpaſſe all credulity or conceit. This City was given in way of honour to the Levites with two thouſand cubits of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the reſt of the countrey it was freely given to Caleb, according as Moſes had commanded it (this was one of thoſe ſpies which Moſes ſent to overlook the land of Canaan.) They gave lands and poſſeſſions likewiſe to Jethro the Madianites poſterity (who was father in law to Moſes) for that they had forſaken their own territories, and annexed themſelves to the Iſraelites, and had been with them in the deſart. The tribe of Juda and Simeon took thoſe cities of the mountainous countrey of Canaan, and thoſe E that were in the Plain neer unto the ſea-coaſt) namely Aſcalon and Azoth.) But as touching Gaza and Accaron, they eſcaped: for theſe cities being in the Plain, and defenced with a great number of chariots, repulſed thoſe that aſſaulted the ſame to their diſadvantage. So theſe two tribes having had good ſucceſſe in warres, retired themſelves into their cities, and laid aſide their weapons.

of their lands, and husbanding their fruits: and being grown in riches they followed the delights and pleasures of the world, yea in such sort grew they dissolute, that they had no mind neither of their policy, nor the laws of their forefathers. Whereupon God was grievously incensed against them, who gave them to understand, first of all, that contrary to his command they had spared the Canaanites: and afterwards, that those Canaanites in time to come should exercise great cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at that which was declared unto them, yet notwithstanding they took no pleasure in feats of armes, both for that they had received many profits by the Canaanites, as also for that (being effeminate through delights) they were unapt for labour. It hapned them at such time as their Aristocraticall government was corrupted, and that they respected not their elders, or any orher magistrates before-time ordained; and were extreamly addicted unto gaine, and infinitely took pleasure therein; that amidst their greatest security, a grievous mutiny and commotion was once more raised amongst them, so that at length they fell at oddes one with another, on that occasion which ensueth.

Iudg.19.per totum. The history of the Levites wife.

A certain Levite and one of them of the common sort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephramites, took a wife that was born in the city of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Juda, whom (by reason of her incomparable beauty) he most intirely loved; and found himself much aggrieved, for that he found not her affection answerable to his love: at last his passion so much prevailed with him, as they grew at oddes, and fell into contentious mislikes, whence at last it fell out that the woman (tired with disquiet) forsook her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband sore aggrieved thereat (by reason of the love which he bare her) came unto her fathers house and appeased the difference, and was reconciled unto her: There abode he for the space of four daies, being friendly entreated and entertained by his wives father and mother. On the fift day, he thought good to return to his own dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reason that the father and the mother gave them a loath farwell, and consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a servant which followed them, and an Asse likewise, on which the woman was mounted, Now when they had travelled the space of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew near the City of Jerusalem: their servant counselled them to take up their lodging in some place, for fear lest by their late travell they mighr fall into some disaster, the rather for that they were not farre from the enemies countrey. and that the present time was such, as might make those things that were most assured, suspected. But this opinion of his pleased not his master, who would not lodge amongst those of a forrain nation (for the City pertained to the Canaanites) but his intent was to passe further, and travell yet twenty furlongs more, to take up his lodging in one of their cities. This advice of his being allowed, they came to Gaba of the tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and whereas they found no man in the market place that might lodge them; at length a certain old man, returning out of the countrey to his house (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that city) meeting with him asked him what he was, and for what cause so late as it was he sought for his supper? He answered that he was a Levite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, and was returning unto his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man having regard unto his parentage (by reason that he was of the same tribe, and that by good hap they had after that manner met the one with the other) lodged him in his own house. But certain young men amongst the Gabeonites, perceiving the woman in that place, were ravished in admiration of her beauty and good graces, and getting some notice afterwards that she had been brought thither as a guest, they set light by him (by reason of his weakness and age, and the small retinue that he had in his house) and came and knockt at his door. The old man required them to depart, and that they should offer him no violence, nor to her, outrage. But contrariwise they importuned him to deliver them his guest, and that done, they promised him in no sort to procure his further molestation. But although that the old man alleadged that she was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Levite, and that they should commit an hainous offence, in sinning for their corrupt pleasures sake against the lawes: yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, menacing him likewise to murther him, because he hindered them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driven to that exigent, that (to the intent they should not offer violence to his guest, and a stranger) he abandoned and prostituted unto them his own daughter, supposing it to be lesse inconvenient to let them satisfie their unbridled concupiscence on her, then that his guest should suffer any villanie; at leastwise he made this account, that by this means he should not be guilty of any injury done unto them. Notwithstanding all this, they intermitted not to sollicite and urge the delivery of the woman

Contrariwiſe he beſought them that they would not be ſo audacious as to violate the laws: but they ſeconded their diſordinate deſires with extreme violence, and raviſhed her perforce, and led her to their own lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lewdly appeaſed their luſt on her) they thruſt her out of doores from them upon the break of day. But ſhe being wholly deſolate, and diſcomforted by this diſaſter, returned to her lodging, and both by reaſon of the agonie which ſhe had ſuffered, as alſo for the ſhame that hindred her from appearing before her husband, who would be incredibly and extremely tormented with that accident, ſhe fell down and gave up the ghoſt. Her husband ſuppoſing that ſhe was onely ſeized with ſome

ration to comfort her, becauſe ſhe had not willingly condeſcended to their violences and luſts, but maugre her reſiſtance was raviſhed by them, and taken out of his lodging. But ſo ſoon as he perceived that ſhe was dead, he moderated his affections, conſidering the extremitie of his evils, and laying the dead body upon his Aſſe, he carried it to his houſe; where he no ſooner arrived, but that he devided and cut the ſame into twelve pieces, which he ſent to the twelve tribes of Iſrael; commanding them that bare the ſame, to tell every tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife, and what villany they had practiſed againſt her. The tribes were very much diſcontented at that which they both ſaw, and heard (having never before that time heard of any the like adventure) and incenſed with ex-

C treme diſpleaſure (and yet juſt) they aſſembled themſelves in Siloe: and being arranged before the Ark, they reſolved ſuddenly to take armes, and to aſſaile the Gabeonites as their capitall and mortall enemies. But the Elders with-held them, declaring unto them that they ought not after that manner to enterprize a headlong warre againſt their brethren, before they had conferred and debated the cauſe with them, and examined the crimes whereof they were accuſed; the rather for that the law permitteth not any warre (no not a-D mongſt ſtrangers) before an enter-parley and embaſſage, which might reclaime thoſe that were held culpable and reduce them to reaſon. For which cauſe they told them that they ſhould conforme themſelves, both according to the letter of the law, and the bond of brotherhood, to ſend certain meſſengers to the Gabeonites, to demand at their hands the authors of that villany, to the end that when they were delivered, they might take their ſatisfaction by their puniſhment: but if they ſhould not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to aſſaile them with open warre. Hereupon they ſent certaine meſſengers to the Gabeonites to accuſe thoſe young men that had perpetrated that indignitie againſt the woman, to demand them at their hands, to the intent they might ſuffer condigne puniſhment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yeeld up the young men, ſuppoſing it to be an indignity for them for fear of war to be o-

E bedient to other mens commandements, by reaſon that they thought themſelves no waies inferiour unto others in feats of war, both in reſpect of their number, and courage both in the one and in the other. The reſt of the tribe alſo made great preparation, by reaſon they were all of them reſolved, and united together, mutually to defend themſelves againſt whoſoever ſhould aſſaile them. After that the report of the Gabeonites anſwer was brought unto the Iſraelites they ſware an oath the one unto the other, that none of them would give their daughters in marriage to a Benjamite, promiſing each of them to iſſue and make war againſt them: againſt whom they were more incenſed, then our predeceſſors have bin animated againſt the Canaanites, as we have bin given to underſtand. They ſpeedily therefore levied and led into the

F field an army of 400000. men againſt them. The Benjamites hoſts conſiſted of 26000. armed men, and 600. others, 50. of which were expert in ſhooting, and fighting with the left hand. The field was fought neere to Gaba, wherein the Benjamites put the Iſraelites to flight, who were ſlain to the number of 22000. and more of them had been ſlaughtered that day, had not the night ſuddenly overtaken them, and ended the skirmiſh. Thus did the Benjamites joyfully return unto their Cities, and the Iſraelites were diſcomfited through their unexpected calamitie. The next day they once more renewed the battel, and the Benjamites had the upper hand once again: ſo that the Iſraelites loſt eighteene thouſand men more, and by that mean forſook their campe thorow fear, and retired to Bethel, which was not farre off from the place. The day after they faſted, and beſought God (by the mediation of Phinees the high Prieſt) that it would pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath againſt them, and that contenting himſelf with the two overthrows which he had ſent them, he would now at-laſt both give them victory and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promiſed them by the prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they divided their Armie into two parts, and laid the one thereof in ambuſh neer unto the Citie. In the mean time (whileſt the other halfe that made head against the Benjamites, retired themselves, to the intent their enemies should G assault them) the Benjamites suddenly issued, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (under purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemie insisted: so that all they likewise, who through age and weakness were left in the citie, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawn farre enough from the city, the Hebrews staied, made head, and fought against them. Then gave they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who suddenly issuing out together, rushed in upon their enemies with a huge crie. Who seeing themselves so suddenly surprized, knew not what to do, but retiring themselves into certain Barricadoes, they defended themselves with arrowes, but all of them were slain, except it were six hundreth: who making head, and closely filletted and embattelled H together, thrust themselves desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this means escaped they into the mountains hard by, where they encamped. All the rest to the number of 25. thousand or there abouts were slain. And the Israelites burned Gaba utterly, and slew both the women and children. They exercised no lesse justice on the other cities of Benjamin (so much were they fleshed and transported with furie. And for that Iabes (a citie of Galaad) would not joyn with them in battell against the Benjamites, they sent twelve thousand chosen men out their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might beare armes, with their wives and children, except foure hundreth virgins. So much grief and furie had they conceived through the accident that chanced to this woman, and the despight they had conceived against the Benjamites for provoking them unto armes: which I furie when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselves, reputing themselves to be deprived of one Tribe: And although they thought them justly oppressed in battell (by reason they had offended against the laws of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalfe of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and revoked those six hundreth that were fled, and held a certain rock in the desart which is called Rhoa. The Embassadors complained not onely for that the warre had extinguished them, but also for the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they prevailed so much, that they bare their crosse and losse with lesse grief, and they came unto them and besought them that they would not give sentence of the totall extinction of the tribe of Benjamin. We grant you (said K they) the revenues of your whole tribe, and as much bootie as you may drive away. But they acknowledging their injustice, and that they were condemned by the just judgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe. and the Israelites gave them in marriage those foure hundreth virgins of Iabes: and for the rest (which were two hundreth) they deliberated with themselves how they might provide them of wives, to the intent they might have issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their warre it was decreed by an oath, that none of them might match his daughter with any of the tribe of Benjamin; there were some of them that thought good that the oath might be suspensed withall) by reason it was grounded upon wrath, and not on judgement) alleadging further, that they should do nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might save a tribe which was in danger utterly L to be extinct: That perjuries were dangerous and noysome, not at such time as they are inforced by constraint, but when they are practised with an intent to do evill. But when as the Elders reclaimed here against (abhorring the mention of perjurie) there arose up a certain man amongst them, that said he had a policy, wherby without breach of oath the Benjamites might light upon wives. And being commanded by the Senate to expresse the same, we have a custome every yeer (said he) to assemble and keep a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we have both our wives and daughters: as many of these as they can ravish, let the Benjamites lay hold of, without reproofe (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by us) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require revenge, we will say that they are in the fault who have negligently kept their daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Benjamites, for that we had too much already used and abused the same toward them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Benjamites to ravish and violently take to themselves wives amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Benjamites (of whom we have spoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush neer unto the citie (amongst the vines and other thickets, and close places, in which they might hide themselves to surprize the Damosels.) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wantoned on their way: but the young men breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (being scattered and divided here and there) and after they had married them, they departed home to labour their land, and began to study

Thus the Tribe of Benjamin (which was welnigh utterly exterminated) was restored to his former dignity after this manner, by the wisedome of the Israelites: and it incontinently flourished and increased in a little time, as well in number of men as in all other things. The Israelites about this time having forgotten the exercise of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Canaanites (in contempt of that nation) raised forces, nor for that they were affraid of their own estates, but to the intent that overlopping the Hebrewes with some memorable overthrow, they might more securely inhabit *Iudg.*18.2, &c. B their cities thereafter: and conspiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and joyning to them certain chariots) they drew Ascalon and Acharon (two cities within the lot of Juda) in to their confederacy, and divers other cities of the champaine countrey: so as they of Dan were driven into the mountaines, having no place in the champaine where they might peaceably inhabite; who (for that neither in warre they were able to confront them, neither had sufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) sent five men of their tribe into the champaine countrey and Midland, to spie if they could find any place that were fit and convenient for them to establish and fix their colonies in. These travelled a daies journey not farre from the mountain of Libanus, and more lower then are the sources of Jordan, bordering upon the great plain of the city of Sidon. In which place

C (having observed that the land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made it known unto their people, who travelling thither with their army, builded a city in that place called Dan (by the name of the sonne of Jacob so called, and in honour of the tribe of Dan.) Many adversities befell the Israelites from that time forwards, both for that they were unexercised in travel, and for that they contemned piety. For having once forsaken the observation of their ordinances, they suffered themselves to be devoured in pleasures, living according to their own appetites: so that they gorged and glutted themselves with those vices, which were most of all accustomed and usual amongst the Canaanites. They of Dan seek out a place to inhabite.

FOr this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort, as (through their negligence) they lost the good which they had gotten by infinite travell. For Schisart king of the Assyrians levied an armie against them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or composition, took divers of them prisoners; and brought their city under his subjection. Divers also willingly submitted themselves unto him, (through the feare they had conceived) and they payed tributes exceeding their powers, enduring all kind of outrage for the space of eight yeares, after which they were delivered by these meanes following. *Iudg.*3.1,2, 3,4. oppressed by The Israelites Schisart.

A Certaine man of the tribe of Iuda called Cenizus, a man of execution and of brave courage, was advertised by a voice from heaven, that he should not permit the Israelites in that sort to be reduced into so extreme necessitie, without taking

F care for them, but that he ought to adventure himselfe to set them at libertie. For which cause, calling unto him some few companions of his perils, who were discontented with their present estate, & desired a change, he first of all discomfited the garrison which Schisart had placed over them: and so much was he furthered with his first successe, that the number of his followers increased more and more, so that they seemed sufficient to equall the enemie in open field: whereupon encountring him in one battell, they overcame him, and recovered their libertie; and the rest of the scattered and confused armie retired themselves toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect given proofe of his valour, he received the government at the peoples hands, and exercised the office of Judge fortie yeares, at the end whereof he died. Iodes or Ehud insinuateth himselfe into Eglons familiaritie. v. 20.

This man (translating his court to Jericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no means whereby he might vexe and molest the people: so that they lived for the space of 18. yeares in great misery. But God (being mooved with their calamities, and supplications) delivered them from their intolerable thraldome after this manner: Iodes the sonne of Gera of the tribe of Benjamin (a young man, both addressed by valour of minde, and strength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Jericho. This man insinuated himself into Eglons familiaritie; and by presents and gifts entertained and courted him in such sort, as he was well beloved and esteemed amongst all those courtiers that were neerest about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certain presents unto the King (attended by two of his houshold servants) he secretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at such time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid-summer and mid-day likewise; whereby the watch was growne the more careless and slothfull, partly by reason of the heat, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The young man therefore offering his presents unto Eglon (who at that time disported himselfe in a certaine summer chamber) began to discourse with him. Now they were both alone (by reason that the King resolving to talke familiarly with Iodes, had sent away his guard, and sate him downe in a seate:) but Iodes fearing, lest failing to stab home enough, he should not give him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to rise, telling him that he had a dreame to report unto him by the commandement of God.

Whereat he rejoycing very much, leapt from his seate; whereupon Iodes stabd him to the heart: and leaving the poynard sticking in his wound, he escaped and locked the doore after him; the guard making no noise at all, supposing that the King had laid him downe to rest. But Iodes giving private notice hereof to them of Jericho, offered himself to be their leader in the recovery of their former libertie: who (willingly accepting thereof) presently tooke armes, and sent trumpets to publish the same thorow the whole countrey: (for after that manner were they wont to assemble the people.) They that were about Eglon, were wholly ignorant of that which hapned: but about the even-tide (fearing lest some mishap had befalne him) they entred into the place where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly astonished, so as they knew not what to doe. For before they had assembled their forces together, the Israelites fiercely charged them, and some they killed instantly; the reast that were ten thousand in number, betook themselves to flie, under hope to recover their countrey of Moab: but the Israelites (having before that, laid and fortified the passages of Jordan) pursued them and slew them: so that divers of them perished in the Ferry, and not one of them remained that escaped their hands. By this means the Israelites were delivered from the servitude of the Moabites: and for this cause Iodes was advanced to the government of the people. Finally, after he had lived for the space of fourescore yeares, he died. A man besides the act of late rehearsed) worthy of praise in all other things. After him Sanagar the sonne of Anath was elected governour, and in the first yeare of his raigne, he left this life to partake the fruition of another.

Jabin King of the Canaanites, subdueth the Israelites.

BUt the Israelites (in no sort reclaimed or reconciled by their forepassed calamities) fell again into their former impiety and disobedience: and before they had sufficiently shaken off the servitude of the Moabites, were subjected unto Iabin King of the Canaanites. This man kept his residence imperiall at Asor (a Citie situate on the lake of Sachonites) he had in his pay thirty thousand foot,

A and ten thouſand horſe: and beſides theſe, he had three thouſand warlike chariots. Over all this huge Armie commanded Siſara, (an eſpeciall man amongſt the Kings favourites) who encountring with the Iſraelites, brought their affairs into ſo deſperate an eſtate, that they willingly for their own ſecuritie ſake) accepted ſervitude, and payed tribute, (whereunto they were enforced, through the auſteritie of their ſubjection, almoſt for the ſpace of twenty yeers, not daring to lift up their heads (all which fell upon them by the will of God, to the end he might puniſh the too great contumacie and ingratitude of that nation. Who at length repenting themſelves, and acknowledging the cauſe of their calamities, (namely, that it proceeded from the contempt of their Laws) they repaired to a certain Propheteſſe, called Debora, (which name in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth a Bee) beſeeching her, that by her

B prayers ſhe would endeavour to provoke God unto mercie (to the intent, he ſhould not ſuffer them ſo to be oppreſſed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compaſſion on them) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governor (a man of the Tribe of Nepthali, whoſe name ſignifieth Lightning.) Debora therefore ſending for Barac, commandeth him to pick out and muſter ten thouſand choſen men, and lead them forth againſt the enemie; alledging, that they were ſufficient to obtain the victorie which God had promiſed by the Oracle. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except ſhe alſo would adminiſter the ſame with him; ſhe moved therewith, ſpake thus: Wilt thou (ſaid ſhe) ſurrender the Dignitie which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuſe it. Whereupon levying ten thouſand men, they pitched their tents neer to the moun-

C tain of Itabyr, Siſara at that time (according as the King had commanded him) preſently marched out to meet them, and encamped himſelf not farre from the enemie. But Barac and the reſt of the Iſraelites (b eing terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Debora, who commanded them, that very day to enter and undertake the battell; aſſuring them, that the victorie ſhould be theirs, and that God would both aſſiſt and help them Whereupon they charged the enemie, and there ſuddenly fell a ſtorm of rain, mixed with hail, which the wind drove againſt the faces of the Canaanites, and took away their ſight, making thoſe that carried Darts, and ſuch as ſerved with the Sling, unprofitable in their ſervice; the Targettiers likewiſe having their hands benummed with cold, could

D ſcarcely wield their ſwords. But the tempeſt beating on the backs of the Iſraelites, not onely wrought them leſſe offence, but made them alſo more forward (being whetted thereunto by the manifeſt ſigne of Gods favour and preſence.) Whereupon diſarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battell, they made a great ſlaughter of them; ſo as part of them fell by the weapons of the Iſraelites, the reſt were over-runne by their own horſemen and Chariots. Siſara alſo, as ſoon as he ſaw his ſouldiers turn their backs, leaping from his Chariot, fled away haſtily, till at laſt he arrived in the Tent of a woman of Cenetis, called Iael; who being

E deſired by him to conceal and hide him, entertained him: and whereas he required drink, ſhe gave him ſowre milk; which when he had over-greedily drunk, he fell aſleep and whileſt he ſo lay buried in his ſlumbers, Iael took a Mallet, and drove an iron Nayle thorow his temples, and faſtned him to the pavement. And anon after, when Baracs ſouldiers came unto her, ſhe ſhewed him unto them, in ſuch manner as he was nayled. And thus a woman, according as Debora had fore-told, was the author of this victorie. But Barac leading his armie to Aſor, ſlew Iabin, that came out againſt him: And having ſlain the King, and levelled the Citie with the ground, he governed the Iſraelites for the ſpace of fourtie yeers.

How Gedeon delivered the Iſraelites.

God commandeth Gedeon to deliver the Iſraelites from the Madianites. Iudg.6,v.11, 12,13.

ABout that time, Gedeon (the ſonne of Iaſus, one of the chiefeſt of the Tribe of Manaſſes) ground certain ſheaves of corn, which he had ſecretly conveyed into his Preſſe: for he durſt not bring them openly, for fear the enemie ſhould have eſpied him. To him appeared there a Viſion, in the forme of a young man, which ſaid unto him, That he was happie, and beloved of God: and that a certain ſigne of his good hap ſhould be, that he ſhould uſe his Preſſe in ſtead of his Grange; willing him to be of good courage, and to endeavour himſelf to recover his Countries libertie. Gedeon anſwered, That it was impoſſible; by reaſon, that the Tribe whereof he was deſcended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and feeble, to think on affairs of ſo great conſequence. But God promiſed him to ſupply his neceſſities, in whatſoever he held himſelf deficient; and aſſured him (under his conduct) that he would give the Iſraelites the victorie. Theſe things Gedeon communicated with certain young men; who willingly beleeving the Oracle, anſwered, That for the preſent they had ten thouſand ſouldiers in a readineſſe, moſt readie to attempt any thing, in regard of their libertie. But God appeared to Gedeon in a dream, and told him, That men naturally were lovers of themſelves, and haters of thoſe who were excellent in vertues: ſo that if there grow any queſtion of victorie, they forget God, and appropriate the ſame unto themſelves, ſaying, That they are many, and all valiant men at arms. To the end therefore that they may conceive his handy work in their deliverance, he counſelled him, That about the mid-time of the day, at ſuch time as the heat was moſt vehement, he ſhould conduct his Armie to the river; and that being there, he ſhould diligently obſerve thoſe that bowed themſelves to drink, which he might eſteeme for men of valour; but all thoſe that drank haſtily and with noiſe, ſhould be marked as men fearfull, and afraid of the enemie. Gedeon did according as God had commanded him: and there were found three hundreth men that lifted water to their mouthes with their hands, with fear and trouble. God willed him, that he ſhould aſſail the enemie with thoſe three hundreth; promiſing, that he would give him the victorie. About this time were they encamped upon the bank of Jordan, readie to paſſe the Foord the next morrow. But Gedeon was ſore troubled, by reaſon that God had before-times told him, that he ſhould aſſail the enemie by night. But God willing to deliver him of his fear, commanded him to take one of his ſouldiers with him, and enter the camp of the Madianites, aſſuring him, that he ſhould be both adviſed and encouraged by themſelves. Whereunto he obeyed; and for his better aſſurance, he took with him one of his ſervants. Now as he drew nigh a certain Tent, he perceived, that they that were within the ſame, were awake, and that one of them with a loud voice told his companion the dream which that night he had had; which Gedeon over-heard, and thus it was: Him ſeemed, that he ſaw a barley cake (ſo lothſome, as no man would feed upon the ſame) which rowled thorow the camp, which firſt over-threw the Kings Tent, and afterwards the Tents of all his ſouldiers; alledging, that this Viſion ſignified the loſſe of the whole Armie. Annexing to this his allegation, the reaſons that induced him thereunto; namely, that of all ſorts of corn, barley is moſt contemptible: and amongſt all the Nations of Aſia, there were not this day any people to be found more diſgraced and contemned then the Iſraelites; and that in this reſpect, they reſembled barley. That which at this day ſeemeth to encourage them, is Gedeon, and the Armie that is with him: and whereas this Cake turned to overthrow our Tents, I fear me leſt God hath given ſome ſigne of victorie unto Gedeon. Gedeon (having over-heard all theſe things) conceived good hope, and tempted with a valiant heart, preſently commanded his domeſtical ſervants to arm themſelves, diſcourſing unto them the Viſion which appeared to their enemie. Whereupon they ſpeedily prepared themſelves at his commandment, ruminating and hammering in their mindes upon that diſcourſe which he had declared unto them. About the latter watch of the night, Gedeon led forth his Armie, and divided them into three Bands, and in every Band he put an hundred men: all of theſe bare in their hands emptie Pots, in which were hidden burning Torches, in ſuch ſort, as the enemie might not diſcover them, when they ſallied out. Moreover, they bare Rams-horns in their right hands, which they uſed in ſtead of Trumpets. The adverſe Armie took up much ground (by reaſon that they had a great number of Camels, and were diſtributed by Nations)

The Hebrews having had inſtructions from their Captain what they ought to do, at ſuch time as they approached neer unto their enemies, and the ſigne of the battell was given, they ſounded their Horns, and brake their Pots, and with their flaming Lights brake into the enemies Camp, crying, Victorie, Victorie, by the aſſiſtance of God, and the ſtrength of Gedeon. Hereupon ſuch a trouble and fear ſurpriſed the enemie, as they lay aſleep, (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue) that few of them fell by the Hebrews ſword, but they themſelves ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in language.) For confuſedly encountring one another, they maſſacred all thoſe that encountred them, ſuppoſing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this ſlaughter, and Gedeons victorie, came unto the eares of the reſt of the Iſrae-

B lites, they armed themſelves, and purſued and overtook the enemie, (being intangled and circumvented in certain places, made unpaſſable through many running brooks) ſo that being environed on every ſide, they were all of them put to the ſword; amongſt which were their two kings, Oreb and Zeb. The reſt of the Chieftains trouping onward with their ſouldiers, to the number of eighteen thouſand, or thereabours, encamped not farre from the Iſraelites: but Gedeon was no wayes aſtoniſhed hereat, but purſuing them valiantly with his whole Armie, and charging them deſperately, he diſcomfited all the reſt of the enemies, and led away captives thoſe Chieftains which remained, namely, Zeb, and Ezarbon. There died in this battell of the Madianites, and Arabians their allies, to the number almoſt of ſixſcore thouſand: beſides that, the Hebrews took an ineſtimable prey of gold, ſilver, appa-

C rell, camels, and other horſes. But Gedeon returning into his countrey, Ephraim ſlue the reſt of the Kings of the Madianites. Nevertheleſſe, the Tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with his happie execution, reſolved to make warre againſt him; accuſing him, for that he had not made them privie of his ſtratagem intended againſt the enemie. But Gedeon being a temperate man, and endowed with all kinde of vertue, gave them this modeſt anſwer, That it was not he that by his own direction had ſet upon the enemie, but that it was Gods onely handy-work: notwithſtanding, that the victorie was no leſſe theirs, then his or thoſe his followers, that atchieved the enterpriſe. And with theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he no leſſe profited the Hebrews thereby, then by his valiant actions; by reaſon, that he delivered them from a civill warre, whereinto they had fallen, if his diſcretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was puniſhed for this outrage offered to ſo noble a perſonage; as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon labouring to diſmiſſe himſelf of the Govern-

D ment, was forced to continue the ſame, and ruled the Iſraelites for the ſpace of fourty yeers, doing juſtice to every one that required the ſame at his hands, and deciding their controverſies (ſo irrevocable and certain was that eſteemed which he had decreed.) Finally, he died when he was very old, and was buried in the countrey of Ephraim.

GEdeon had ſeventie lawfull ſonnes, begotten on divers lawfull wives. He had likewiſe one Baſtard by his Concubine Druma, which he called Abimelech: who, after the deceaſe of his father, retired himſelf to Sichem, where his mother was born. There (aſſiſted with money by his mothers kindred, and backed by them who were men reſolute, and addreſſed to all facinorous actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlew all his brethren (except Iothan, who by good hap ſaved himſelf by flight.) Now when as Abimelech had once obtained the Tyrannie, he ruled all things according to his luſt, and neglected the Ordinances and preſcript of Law, hating all thoſe

F that in any ſort were maintainers of equitie. One day therefore, whileſt there was a ſolemne feaſt held at Sichem, (whereunto the whole people were uſually wont to reſort) Iothan his brother (who, as we ſaid, ſaved himſelf by flight) climbing the mountain of Garizim, which over-hangeth the citie of Sichem, with a loud voice (which might eaſily be over-heard by the people, and in a generall ſilence of the whole multitude) he beſought them, that they would hear him in a few words; and when as they intentively liſtned with a greater and more reverend ſilence, he told them, in times paſt the Trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain aſſembly, wherein they were to conſult of their government) they beſought the Fig-tree to accept the ſoveraigntie over them;

Whereupon he reſolved to do ſome miſchief to both the Citie and Citizens. And for that their Vintage was at hand, and they durſt not gather the fruit, fearing leſt they ſhould receive ſome injury at the hands of Abimelech, by good hap about that time a certain Prince, called Gaal, retired thither with a troop of ſouldiers, and his kindred: Him did the Sichemites beſeech, that he would grant them a Convoy, whileſt they had gathered in their Harveſt. This calamitie hapned to the Sichemites, in ſo grievous a meaſure, that there is not any grief ſufficient to deplore it, were it not, that, that ſo horrible misfortune fell upon them, by reaſon of their ingratitude they had ſhewed to ſo upright a Judge, and ſo gracious a Benefactor. Abimelech allayed the courage of the Iſraelites, by this encounter and conqueſt of the Sichemites, and gave ſufficient teſtimonie that he aſpired more higher, and that he would never terminate

A terminate his violence untill he had utterly extinguiſhed them. He therefore led forth his Army againſt the Tibeans and their city, which he took: but in that town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themſelves, and whileſt he prepared himſelf to beſiege the ſame, and approached likewiſe near unto the gates, a certain woman caſt a piece of a milſtone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cauſe that Abimelech called at that time for his Squire, commanding him to diſpatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that he died by the hand of a woman. His Squire did as he had commanded him, and revenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the cruelty he had committed againſt his brethren, and the tyranny executed upon the Sichemites; on whom all theſe misfortunes fell according as Jothan had foretold them. As ſoon as Abimelech was ſlain, all

B the Army was diſperſed, and every one returned unto his dwelling place: and Iair the Galeadite of the Tribe of Manaſſes took upon him the Government. Amongſt other conditions of this man, theſe were of the greateſt note, that he was rich, and had thirty worthy ſonnes, all expert upon horſe-back, and exerciſed the magiſtracy in the countrey of Galaad: (he after he had governed the people for the ſpace of twenty yeers) died, when he was very old and was honourably intombed in Chamon a city of Galaad. From this time forward the policy and eſtate of the Hebrews grew more and more diſordered, and the laws began to be neglected: Whence it came to paſſe, that the Ammonites and Philiſtines (ſetting light by them) deſtroyed all their countrey with a great Army, during which time they occupied all the land on this ſide Jordan, and ſo much were they heartned, as that they preſſed further; and poſſeſſed the better part on the other ſide of the river, and conquered the ſame. Where-

C upon the Hebrews being brought to more moderation by theſe their adverſities, had their recourſe unto God by prayers and ſacrifices, requiring him that it might pleaſe him to moderate his wrath, and that having regard and reſpect to their ſupplication, he would be pleaſed to ſtay his heavy hand over them. This ſubmiſſion of theirs prevailed with God, who inclined himſelf to aſſiſt them. Whileſt therefore the Ammonites led their army into Galaad, they of the countrey aroſe to meet and fight with them; being diſfurniſhed of a Governour to conduct them. Now there was a certain man called Jeptha, of great eſtimation, as well for the vertue of his anceſtors, as his own particular valour (the rather for that he had been trained and maintained in warlike ſervice.) To him they ſent a meſſenger, requiring

D him that he would aſſiſt them; promiſing him, that he ſhould continue in the government during the terme of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their requeſt, but reproachfully objected againſt them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reaſon he was not their brother by the ſame mother, but a ſtranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his Paramour, they had driven him out of their family ſetting light by him; by reaſon of his baſe birth) yet notwithſtanding he had lived in Galaad, receiving all thoſe into wages which came unto him, of what place ſoever they were. But after they had beſought him, and ſworn unto him that he ſhould continue in the government, he became their Generall in warre, and ſpeedily (providing and foreſeeing whatſoever was neceſſary) he encamped himſelf neer unto Maſpha, and ſent Ambaſſadors to the Ammonites, accuſing them for invading a countrey that belonged not unto them. They contrariwiſe blamed the Iſraelites, for that

E they were fled like fugitives from Egypt, and commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their ancient patrimony.) Jeptha anſwered that they had no reaſon to accuſe their anceſtors, in reſpect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to give them thanks, for that they had permitted them to enjoy the countrey of Ammon, by reaſon it was in Moſes power to have commanded the ſame. In a word, they were reſolved not to forſake the countrey which God had both given and purchaſed for them, and which they had held in their poſſeſſion for the ſpace of three hundred yeers, alledging that he would defend the ſame againſt them by dint of ſword: with theſe words diſmiſſed he the Embaſſadours of the Ammonites. Then beſought he God that it might pleaſe him to grant

F him victory: and he made a vow that if he returned unto his houſe whole and in ſafety, he would offer up in ſacrifice, that of his, that he ſhould firſt meet withall in his return: whereupon encountring the enemy he defeated him, and purſued him, killing thoſe that fled continually till he came to the city of Maniathen. Then entring the countrey of the Ammonites, he deſtroyed divers Cities, and led away a great prey, and deliuered and ranſomed divers ſlaves of that nation, who had endured that ſervitude for the ſpace of eighteen yeers. But as he returned homeward; he fell into ſuch an inconvenience, as was no waies anſwerable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eighteen yeers) came out to meet him: whereupon reſolving and melting himſelf into tears, he began to check

v. 1, 2, &c. The Ephraimites are incensed against Jeptha. Judg. 12.

The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would have sent out men of warre against him, (by reason he had not communicated his enterprise against the Ammonites with them, but had onely reserved the prey, and usurped the honour of the execution to himself) whereunto he answered first of all, That being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he, and his were assailed by warre; and had, besides that, also been required to give them their assistance; whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Secondly, he told them, that, that which they undertook, was both unlawfull and most wicked, in that not daring to confront or assail the enemy, they made no bones to set upon and assault their own brothers and familiars, threatning them, that if they governed not themselves, he would (by the assistance of God) be revenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected and despised, so that he was forced to arm himself against them, and with an host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preventing their passage who fled unto Jordan: and the number of those that were slain, amounted to fourty thousand or thereabouts. But after that Jeptha had governed six yeers, he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his decease, Apsan took upon him the government. He was of the Tribe of Juda, of the City of Bethleem, and had sixty children, thirty males and thirty females, which he left all alive and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy either recitall or memory, during the space of his seven yeers government: he was buried in his countrey. Elon a Zabulonite his successour differed nothing from him in the same, and during the terme of ten yeers wherein he governed, he atchieved nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the sonne of Elon (of the Tribe of Ephraim of the city of Pharathon) was declared soveraigne Judge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicity in his children (by reason that the estate was in peace and security, and that he exploited nothing worthy glory) he had fourty sonnes, who had thirty other children, and he rode accompanied with these seventy, who were all of them expert on horseback. He left them all alive, and died when he was very old, and was magnificially buried in Pharathon.

Of Samsons valour, and how many mischiefs he did unto the Philistines.

Judg. 13. 1. The Israelites are overcome by the Palestines. Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 13. ali. 10.

After his death, the Philistines had the upper hand over the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of fourty yeers. From that misery were they ransomed after this manner: Manoach an excellent man, and one of the chiefest of the Tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely esteemed Prince amongst them, had a wife most famous for her beauty, and excellent amongst all other of that time; yet had he no children by her; whereat he was very sore displeased; and for this cause he made his continuall prayers unto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farm) beseeching him that it might please his Majesty, to grant him some lawfull heir and successour (now the place whither they resorted, was situate in a broad plain.) Furthermore he loved his wife so exceedingly, that he almost doated on her, and for this occasion he was extremely jealous of her. Whilest thus the woman lived solitarily by her self, an Angell of God appeared unto her in a vision, promising her a goodly, fair, and puissant sonne, who denounced unto her the pleasant message of the birth of her child, which God by his providence would bestow upon her; who should be goodly and admirable in his forces, and under whom also (as soon as he should atttain to mans estate) the Philistines should endure many overthrows: exhorting her not to cut his hair, commanding likewise

But ſhe deſirous to mitigate his diſcontent, and that diſtruſt which he had vainly and unadviſedly conceived; beſought God that it might pleaſe him once more to ſend his Angel unto her, to the intent that her husband might ſee him. Whileſt therefore they lived in this ſort out of Town, the Angell preſented himſelf again (through the grace of God) and appeared unto the woman (being apart from her husband.) The Angel anſwered him, that it ſufficed that ſhe onely knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his ſon ſhould be born, he might both give him preſents, and preſent him thanks. The Angel anſwered, that he had no need thereof, by reaſon that he had not brought the good news of the birth of his ſon for any neceſſitie that he had: Manoach beſought him to ſtay and receive ſome token of kindneſs: but he would not conſent. Finally, being inſtantly preſſed to abide and receive ſome gift: Manoach killed a Kid, and commanded his wife to roaſt the ſame. And when as all things were in readineſs, the Angel commanded them to lay the bread and fleſh upon a rock without diſhes: which being done, he touched the fleſh with a wand which he bare in his

C hand, and ſuddenly a flaming fire conſumed both the bread, and fleſh; and the Angel was ſeen to aſcend up into heaven in the ſmoke, as it were in a Chariot. Manoach was afraid leſt ſome inconvenience ſhould happen unto him, by reaſon that they had in that ſort ſeen God: but his wife recomforted him, by reaſon that God had appeared unto them for their profit-ſake. Anon after ſhe became big with child, and obſerved all that which had been commanded her, and when the Infant was born, ſhe called his name Sampſon (which is as much to ſay, as ſtrong) who preſently endowed with an excellent beautie both of mind and body, uſing his hair unſhorn, and ſobrietie in his diet, he ſeemed to make ſhew in himſelf of ſome propheticall and more then humane forwardneſs.

D It happened on a day that there was a ſolemnitie celebrated in Thamna, a Citie of the Philiſtines, whither Sampſon reſorted with his father and mother; and was ſurprized with the love of one of the damoſels of that place requiring his father and mother that this maiden might be given him in marriage: which they refuſed to do, alledging that ſhe was not of the ſame linnge that he was of, and that God would provide him of a match to the good and profit of thoſe of his Nation: but in the end he prevailed ſo much, that he eſpouſed the maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her parents, it happened one day, that being diſarmed, he met with a Lion upon the way, whom he graſped and ſtrangled with his hands; and having ſlain him, he caſt the bodie of the beaſt into a wood not far diſtant from the high way. They travelled for the ſpace of three dayes to find out the ſenſe thereof, but they could not: and therefore they required Sampſons beſt beloved, that ſhe would ſound the ſecrets thereof, and diſcloſe the ſame unto them; which if ſhe failed to perform, they threatned to burn her to death. Sampſon at the firſt (notwithſtanding all her flatteries and ſollicitations) denied to tell it her: at laſt ſhe urged him ſo inſtantly, and ſhed ſo many tears (telling him that if he did not expound the queſtion unto her, that ſhe would take it for a certain ſigne that he hated her: that at laſt he told her what hapned with the Lion which he had ſlain, and how in him he had the three honey-combs which he brought unto her: and (ſuſpectleſs of either fraud or guile) he decipphered the whole ſtory unto her, and ſhe afterwards reported the ſame to thoſe that had beſought her in that behalf. When as therefore the ſeventh day was come wherein the queſtion was to be decided, they aſſembled themſelves together about ſun-ſet, and ſaid: There is nothing more irkſome to meet withall then a Lion, neither any thing more pleaſant to taſte, then honey: Whereunto Sampſon replied, That there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for ſhe it is that hath reported my words unto you. Notwithſtanding all this, he delivered that which he had promiſed them out of that booty, which he had taken from certain Aſcalonites, whom he encountred upon the way. From that time forward he forſook this marriage, and the woman (the more to deſpite him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalf firſt ſollicited the marriage. Sampſon (being the more incenſed by this injury) reſolved to revenge himſelf both on her and the whole Nation: For which cauſe in the ſummer ſeaſon (when the corn was ready to be reapt) he took three hundreth Foxes, to whoſe tayls he faſtned flaming Torches and drove them into the Philiſtines fields of corn, conſuming by this means all their harveſt hope. The Philiſtines underſtanding that Sampſon had done this, and conceiving the reaſon that induced him to execute this action, ſent their Garriſon to Thamna, and burnt this woman alive with all her kindred, as the Authours of that loſs that had happened unto them. After that Sampſon had ſlain divers Philiſtines in the Countrey, he went and dwelt at Etam (which is a ſtrong Rock in the Tribe of Juda.) For which cauſe the Philiſtines aſſailed that Tribe, who certified them that there was no reaſon why they ſhould ſuffer for thoſe offences which were committed by Sampſon, and that in eſpeciall, becauſe they payed them tribute. The Philiſtines replied, That except they would be maintainers of this act of injuſtice, they ſhould deliver Sampſon unto them. They therefore (deſirous that the Philiſtines ſhould have no cauſe of quarrel againſt them) came unto the Rock to the number of 3000. men, or thereabouts, and blamed Sampſon for thoſe actions which he dared to commit againſt the Philiſtines (as people that might endammage all the Nation of the Hebrews: alledging further that they came to the end to take, ſurpriſe and deliver him into the Philiſtines hands, praying him to ſubmit himſelf voluntarily to that their reſolution. Sampſon made them ſwear that they would do him no further injurie, but deliver him onely unto their enemies, and that done, he deſcended from the Rock, ſurrendring himſelf to the hands of thoſe of Juda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliver him to the Philiſtines. Now being arrived in a certain place, which before that time had no name, and at this preſent is called the Maxilla, that is to ſay, a Jaw (by reaſon of the valour which Sampſon ſhewed in that place) and approaching near the Philiſtines camp; ſhouting and rejoycing in their preſence, by reaſon that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them: Sampſon brake his bonds, and catching up the jaw of an Aſſe which he found at his feet, and marching forth againſt the Philiſtines, he ſlew and beat down to the number almoſt of two thouſand of them, putting all the reſt to flight and confuſion. Sampſon (becoming more elate after this execution then he ought to have been, and confeſſing not that it was done by the aſſiſtance of God, but attributing the ſame to his own vertue) gloried, that with the jaw of an Aſſe he had partly ſlain and partly conſtrained the enemies both to fear and flie. But being ſeized with an exceeding thirſt, he acknowledged and confeſſed that mans force is of no force, and proteſted that all ought to be aſcribed to God, whom he beſought that he would not be diſpleaſed with that which he had ſpoken, but that it might be remitted, and himſelf delivered from the preſent danger. Whereupon God heard his prayers, and cauſed a pleaſant and aboundant fountain to iſſue and ſpring from the foot of a Rock: for which cauſe Sampſon called the place Maxilla or Jaw, which name continueth even unto this day. After this battel Sampſon ſet light by the Philiſtines, and went to Gaza where he ſojourned in an Inne. The Governours of the Citie underſtanding of his arrivall, ſet men to keep the gates, to the end he might not depart without their knowledge. But Sampſon (being no wayes ignonorant of that which they intended againſt him) aroſe about midnight and carried away the gates, with the hinges and locks, and all the furniture of the ſame; and laying them on his ſhoulders, carried and caſt them on the mountain Hebron, Not long after that, he tranſgreſſed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domeſticall manner of living, conforming himſelf to the faſhions of the Gentiles, which was the ſource and of-ſpring of all his ruin. For he was ſurprized and intangled with the love of one that was called Dalila (which was a common ſtrumpet amongſt the Philiſtines.) To her reſorted the governours of the Philiſtines,

A Philiſtines, and by promiſes wrought ſo much with her, that they wrought her to work out of him wherein his force conſiſted, and what the cauſe was that he might not be apprehended by his enemies. She (converſing with him in drinking and keeping him company) told him that ſhe marvelled at his actions, and by ſubtill inſinuations practiſed to underſtand the manner and cauſe that made him ſo excellent in vertue. But Samſon (that as yet was ſubtill, ſtayed and well governed) in countercheck of her craft anſwered her: that if he were tied with ſeven vine branches that were young and pliant, he ſhould become the moſt feebleſt amongſt men. Whereupon for that time ſhe contented her ſelf; and having given notice thereof to the Governours of the Philiſtines, ſhe had in her houſe certain men of warre: then when he was drunk and aſleep, ſhe bound him as ſtrongly faſt as might be paſſible, and ſuddenly waking him, told him that certain ſouldiers were at hand to aſſail him: but Samſon B brake the bonds of the vine branches, and addreſſed himſelf to repulſe the aſſaults of thoſe that lay in wait to offend him. The woman fruſtrate of thar hope which ſhe expected, not long time after that (getting a fit opportunity, in that Samſon converſed continually) began grievouſly to complain againſt him, for that diſtruſting her love and conſtancy, he had concealed that from her which ſhe moſt of all deſired to know, as if ſhe had been inſufficient to conceal that which might any waies concern the fortune and ſafety of her beloved: But he deceived her the ſecond time, and ſaid unto her, that if he were tyed with ſeven cords, he ſhould loſe his force. Which when ſhe had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Samſon told her, that if ſhe pleighted his hair with a fillet, he ſhould be weakned: and having experimented that alſo, ſhe found that it was falſe. Finally C (for that a great misfortune attended upon him) ſhe beſought him ſo much, that at laſt he condeſcended to gratifie her, and ſpake to her after this manner: God hath care over me, and I am by his ſpecial providence bred and brought up: for this cauſe I nouriſh this hair for that God hath commanded me not to cut the ſame; becauſe my force ſhall endure and augment as long as theſe locks ſhall endure and grow. Which when ſhe underſtood, ſhe ſhaved off his hair and betrayed him to his enemies, whoſe forces at that time he was too feeble to reſiſt, who plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound: but in ſpace of time his hair grew again, and at ſuch time as the Philiſtines celebrated a publick feaſt (wherein the Princes and Peers banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a houſe, the cover whereof was faſtened with two pillars) Samſon was ſent for, and brought to the D feaſt, to the end they might mock at him in the midſt of their feaſts and drunkenneſſe. But he taking it more grievouſly then all other the evils which he indured, that he might not revenge himſelf on thoſe that thus injuriouſly did injure him: he wrought ſo much with the boy that led him, that he approached and took hold of the foreſaid pillars, telling him that he had great need to repoſe himſelf, conſidering the travell that he had ſuſtained. As ſoon therefore as he got hold on them, he ſhook them in ſuch a ſort, as they were over-turned, and the houſe fell upon thoſe that were therein, who died to the number of three thouſand men: with theſe alſo died Samſon, who finiſhed his daies in this ſort, after he had commanded over Iſrael for the ſpace of twenty years: he was a man of great vertue, force and magnanimity: and eſpecially in that which concerneth his end, he meriteth to be admired at, becauſe that even unto his latter hour he was animated againſt the Philiſtines. And E whereas he was allured and beſotted by a woman, it ought to be attributed to humane nature, which is ſo weak that it cannot reſiſt ſin: otherwiſe in all other things, we ought to yield teſtimony of his vertue. His kinſfolk took his body and buried it in Saraſa his countrey, by his parents.

CHAP. XI.

How the ſonnes of Eli the High Prieſt were ſlain in battel by the Paleſtines.

F AFter the deceaſe of Samſon, Eli the High Prieſt took upon him the government over the Iſraelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech unable to endure the miſerie thereof, came from Bethlehem a city of the Tribe of Juda to inhabit in the countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife. and Chelion and Maalon his ſonnes, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate ſucceſſe as might be deſired, he married his ſonnes to certain daughters of the Moabites, Chelion unto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten years after, Elimelech and his ſonnes died; the one after the other. By which miſhap Naomi being caſt into great ſorrow, and deſtitute of their companie, whoſe dear familiarity ſhe had preferred before the love of her Countrey: changing her reſolution (according to thoſe occurrences occurrences that had happenned her) ſhe determined to return unto her friends, by reaſon G

The year of the world, 2811. before Chriſts nativity, 1153. ſhe had received intelligence, that her countrey at that time was in good eſtate. But her daughters in law could no wayes endure to be ſeparated from her; and will ſhe, nill ſhe, they would needs accompanie her: but ſhe willing them a more happie marriage then that which they enjoyed with her ſonnes, and in all other things proſperity, and proteſting unto them c. 1. v. 7, ad 14. that there was no abilitie in her to do them good; ſhe beſought them that they would ſtay in that place, and not (deſiring to follow their wretched mother in law in an uncertain event) to loſe the certain pleaſure and peaceable fruition of their countrey. Theſe her perſwaſions took effect with Orpha: but Ruth (reſolved in no ſort to forſake her) attended on v. 15, ad 19. Naomi after the deceaſe of her husband and ſonnes, departeth with Ruth into her own countrey. her mother in law (as an aſſured and future companion of whatſoever fortune ſhould fall H upon her.) Now when as both of them were arrived in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinſman) entertained them in his houſe: and whereas the citizens called her by the name of Naamis, ſhe ſaid unto them, that it was more ſeemly for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth good hap, and Mara is as much to ſay as bitterneſſe.) Whereas then it was harveſt time, Ruth by the permiſſion of her mother, went out into the fields to glean and gather corn for her ſuſtenance: and it fortuned that ſhe met by good hap in the fields with Boos, who came thither likewiſe not long after; who beholding her, inquired and queſtioned with the chief reaper as touching the woman. Now he had a little before that time underſtood by her, her whole eſtate; which he declared unto his maſter, who gave her thanks for the good affection which ſhe bare unto her mother in law, and of the care ſhe had I of her deceaſed ſonne, whom Ruth had married, wiſhing her in effect all good fortune: and not ſuffering her to glean, he permitted her to reap and to gather all that which ſhe might, commanding his maſter-reaper that he ſhould no waies let her from taking whatſoever ſhe pleaſed: giving order likewiſe, that when the reapers ſhould take their refection, they ſhould give her both meat and drink. Now when as Ruth had received grain at their hands, ſhe reſerved it for her mother in law, and came home at night and brought her the ſheaves. In like manner Naomi had reſerved a portion of certain victuals for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had ſent her. Upon her return Ruth reported unto her all thoſe words that Boos had ſaid unto her: and Naomi gave her to underſtand that Boos was of her kinne, and that it might be that he was moved by devotion towards God to have care of K her. Some other dayes after, Ruth iſſued again with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings; And certain dayes after (and about that time that they threſhed barley) Boos came Ruth 3. v. 14. and ſlept on the floor: which when Naomi underſtood, ſhe bethought her ſelf of ſome ſubtill practice, whereby ſhe might make Ruth lie with him (preſuming that it would be a very good fortune for the young woman, if they might grow in acquaintance together) for Ruth by her mother in laws perſwaſion lieth at Boos feet. which cauſe ſhe ſent her to ſleep at his feet. Ruth (that made it a conſcience to contradict her mother in law in whatſoever ſhe commanded her) repaired thither, and upon her firſt arrivall Boos perceived nothing (becauſe he was faſt aſleep:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was ſome body that lay faſt by him, he demanded what ſhe was: whereupon ſhe told him her name, requeſting him as her maſter, that he would permit L her to repoſe in that place for that time. But early in the morning, before the ſervants began to fall to their work, he commanded her to ariſe, and to take as much barley with her as ſhe could bear, to the end ſhe might return unto her mother in law, before that any man might perceive that ſhe had ſlept in that place (becauſe it is wiſdome to avoid ſlander, eſpecially at ſuch time when there is occaſion offered for a man to ſpeak ill.) Touching the reſt, (ſaid he) the matter ſtandeth thus: Thou haſt a kinſman (ſaid he) that is more neer thee in blood then I am; thou muſt enquire of him, if it be his pleaſure to take thee to his Ruth 4. v. 1, ad wife: and if he ſaith that he liketh thee, thou muſt then neceſſarily ſubmit unto him: but if he refuſe thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the law intendeth. Now when ſhe had reported theſe news unto her mother in law, ſhe gathered courage and conceived hope that Boos would take care of her. Thereupon Boos came into the city about noon- M dayes, and called a Councell of the Elders, and ſent for Ruth and his kinſman, to whom in perſon he ſpake thus: Doeſt thou poſſeſſe the heritage of Abimelech and his ſucceſſours? Who when he had publickly declared that he was ſeized thereof in right of proximity, according to the ordinance of the Law: Boos replied, Thou muſt not (ſaith he) onely obſerve the Laws in part; but thou muſt preciſely execute them according as they are. Boos exhorteth his kinſman to marry Ruth. For, behold here a young woman, whom it behoveth thee to marry according to the Law, if thou wilt be inheritour of his poſſeſſions. But he ſurrendred unto Boos, not onely the poſſeſſions, but alſo the woman; by reaſon that Boos was allied alſo to thoſe that were dead, and eſpecially for that the ſaid kinſman had already both wife and children.

Boos

A Boos therefore (having firſt of all taken witneſs of all the councell) called for the woman, and willed her to draw near unto her kinſman, and to unlooſe his ſhoe, and ſtrike him on the face (according as the law had ordained) which done, Boos eſpouſed Ruth, by whom (about a year after) he had a ſon, which Naomi brought up, and by the advice of the women ſhe called his name Obed (becauſe ſhe had nouriſhed him in her age: for Obed in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth a ſlave.) Obed begat Jeſſe, and Jeſſe begat David, who was King, and who left the Realm to his ſucceſſours for one and twentie generations of men. I have been enforced to declare theſe things as touching Ruth, becauſe I have an intent to declare the power of God, to whom it is poſſible to raiſe men from obſcuritie to the higheſt tipp and title of dignity, as he had choſen David, who deſcended from theſe of whom I have ſpoken.

B The affairs of the Hebrews were at this time in very poore eſtate, and they armed themſelves anew againſt the Philiſtines upon this occaſion: The high Prieſt Eli had two ſons, Ophni and Phinees. They againſt all right and law (offering outrages to men, and urging impieties againſt God) ſuffered no ſinne to over-ſlip them which they committed not: for they tooke preſents, partly in way of honour, partly raviſhed by force and rapine. And as touching thoſe women, that came unto the Tabernacle in way of devotion, they abuſed them, and raviſhing ſome againſt their wills, and corrupting ſome others by preſents, they ſo lewdly lived, that their life ſeemed to be a true and licentious tyrannie: for this cauſe their father was ſore diſpleaſed with them, but the people were ſo much the more over-burthened with grief, becauſe as yet they perceived not that Gods puniſhment ſhould ſo ſuddenly fall upon them. But incontinently after that God had declared to Eli and the Prophet Samuel (who about that time was very young) what miſhap ſhould fall upon Elies children, he mourned over them, as if they had been already dead. But I will firſt of all declare ſomewhat unto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards will I ſpeak of the children of Eli, and what inconvenience fell upon all the Hebrew Nation. Elcana was a Levite of baſe condition, living in Ramatha a part of Ephraim: he had married two wives, the one called Anna, the other Phenanna: by Phenanna he had children; yet notwithſtanding loved he Anna very intirely, although ſhe were barren. Now as Elcana with his wives repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was reſident (as we have before declared) to the intent to offer ſacrifice in that place: whileſt, I ſay, during the feſtivall he diſtributed the portion of his meat to his wives and children, Anna (beholding the children of his other wife ſitting round about their mother) began to weep and lament with her ſelf, becauſe ſhe was without iſſue and alone. And after that by her grief ſhe had overcome all that conſolation which her husband could give her, ſhe went into the Tabernacle to beſeech God, that it might pleaſe him to give her a ſonne, and make her a mother; promiſing that her) firſt begotten ſonne ſhould be dedicated unto the ſervice of God, and ſhould lead a particular life far differing from that of other living men. And for that ſhe employed long time in making her prayers, the high Prieſt Eli, who ſate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, ſuppoſing that ſhe had taſted too much wine: but after that ſhe had told him that ſhe drank nothing but water, and that (being oppreſſed with grief) ſhe was come into the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it might pleaſe him to grant her children; he exhorted her to be of good courage, promiſing that God had heard her prayers: whereupon ſhe returned to her husband repleniſhed with good hope, and took her repaſt with joy and gladneſs. When as then they returned to their own houſe, ſhe began to wax big with childe, and at laſt ſhe bare a little young ſon, whom ſhe called Samuel (that is to ſay, Requeſted at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer ſacrifice, and give thanks unto God for the birth of the childe, which God had given them, and to bring their tenths; whereupon the woman (remembring her of the vow ſhe had made in his behalf) delivered him into the hands of Eli, and conſecrated him unto God to be his Prophet. For which cauſe they ſuffered his hair to grow, and he drank nothing but water, and Samuel was nouriſhed and brought up in the Temple: Elcana had by Anna other ſons and three daughters. But as touching Samuel (incontinently after he had attained to the age of twelve years) he prophecied. On a certain night therefore whileſt he ſlept, God called him by his name: and he ſuppoſing that the high Prieſt had wakened him; came unto him: but he told him that he had not called him. This notwithſtanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being ſore amazed, he ſaid unto him, Samuel, I neither now at this preſent, nor before this time have ſpoken unto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, anſwer him therefore, and ſay, Here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more; and he required him that it might pleaſe him to ſpeak, and he would anſwer, not failing any wayes to do him ſervice in that wherein he ſhould command him. Whereunto God anſwered, saying: Since (saith he) thou art here, know that so great a calamitie shall fall upon the Israelites, that there is not any tongue that may expresse the same, or man that may believe it. And because that which Samuel prophecied in effect proved true, his reputation increased dayly more and more.

1 Sam. 4. v. 1. ad 4. The Palestines kill four thousand of the Israelites.

In that time the Philistines (leading out their Army against the Israelites) incamped near unto the Citie of Amphec, and for that the Hebrews were negligent to withstand them, they passed further into the Counties thereabout: so that in fighting with their enemies, the Philistines at last got the upper hand, and slew the Hebrews, and had them in chace for the space of four miles, pursuing the rest of those that fled even unto their own Tents. Whereupon the Hebrews grew jealous and afraid of their whole estate: and therefore sent they to the Councell of the Elders and the high Priest, praying them to bring the Ark of God with them, to the end that having it in presence with them, they might strike the battell and overcome their enemies. But they bethought them not, that he that had pronounced the sentence of their calamitie against them, was greater then the Ark which was made for him. H

v. 4. c. The Hebrews bring the Ark into the battel.

The Ark then was brought, and the sons of Eli attended it, whom their father had expressly commanded, that if it so fell out that the Ark was taken, they should never more come before his presence, except they would die. Now Phinees executed the Office of the high Priest by the permission of his father, by reason he was very aged. I

v. 5. ad 11.

The Hebrews because of the presence of the Ark conceived very great hope and assurance, that they should have the upper hand of their enemies. The Philistines likewise were sore amazed, fearing the presence of the same: but the issues were not answerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they joyned battell, the victorie which the Hebrews hoped should be theirs, fell unto the Philistines; and the losse which the Philistines feared, fell upon the Hebrews, who at last perceived that they had reposed their confidence on the Ark all in vain. For as soon as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned their backs, and lost about thirtie thousand men, amongst whom the sonnes of the high Priest were slain, and the Ark was taken and carried away by the enemie. AS soon as the news of this overthrow was brought into Silo, and that it was certainly known that the Ark was taken (for a young Benjamite, who was at the execution, was come to bring tidings thereof) all the Citie was filled with sorrow: and Eli the high Priest (who sate in one of the gates on a high Throne) understanding the lamentation, and judging that some disaster had befallen his people; sent to seek out this young messenger, by whom he was advertised of that which had happened. This accident of his sons and the Army he bare with great moderation, because that before that time he had understood by God what should happen (for those adversities which are least suspected, do more grievously oppress us, at such time as they happen:) But when he knew that the Ark was surprised, and in the enemies hands, by reason that it happened beyond his expectation, he was in such sort attainted with grief, that he suffered himself to fall from his throne upon the ground, where he died: he lived ninety and eight years in all, and had spent fourty of them in the government of the people. How the Paleſtines compelled by peſtilence and famine, ſent back the Ark of Covenant unto the Hebrews.

AFter that the Philiſtines had gotten the victory over the Hebrews, and taken the ſacred Ark (as we have before this declared) they brought it with other their ſpoyls, unto the City of Azot, and placed it in manner of a trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idoll. But on the next day after (when early in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their god) they found him fallen from that baſe or pillar that ſuſtained him, and lay along upon the ground, his face upward before the Ark; whereat being ſore moved, they took and faſtned him in his former place: and when as they came very oftentimes thither, and alwayes found him proſtrate, and adoring before the Ark, a great fear and perturbation invaded the whole people. At length a grievous plague, not onely ranged in the Citie of Azot, but alſo ſeized on all the inhabitants of the Countrey. For the people being ſuddenly taken with the flix, died in great torment, and ſome of them vomited up their bowels, being corrupted and corroded with the diſeaſe. Beſides this, the whole land ſwarmed with mice, who deſtroying all things, neither ſpared the corn, nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus overpreſſed with theſe calamities, and unable any longer to indure the ſame, underſtood that the Ark was the cauſe thereof, and that that neither the victory, neither the surprizall of the same, had any wayes procured either their good or profit. They therefore sent unto the Ascalonites, requiring them that they would receive the Ark into their Citie, (who willingly condescending to their Embassage and demand) received the Ark, and were presently plagued with the same sicknesses and mishaps, which the Azotians had suffered. For together with the Ark the calamities also were translated, for which cause it was likewise sent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while: for the Inhabitants of that place being afflicted by the same grievances which the other indured, sent it to the neighbour Cities, so that after this sort the Ark was conveyed to five Cities of the Palestines (exacting as it were by those plagues a tribute in every one of them of violated Religion) who wearied with so many evils, and made examples unto others not to entertain the Ark, which so grievously recompensed those that received the same, perceived, that there was no other way left them, but to find out some good means to rid themselves of the same. When as therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Ascalon, Gaza, and Azot, were assembled, they consulted amongst themselves what were best to be done, and first of all they resolved to send back the Ark unto those to whom it appertained, whose captivitie God did revenge, in that with it many plagues entred into the same Region, and ceased not to waste both their men and their Countrey. There were some that said, that this resolution was unseemly to be executed, denying that these things should be imputed to the captivitie of the Ark (whose power if it were so great as they intended, or if God had any wayes care of the same, he would never have permitted it to have fallen into the hands of men of a contrary religion) perswading them to digest these misfortunes with an equall mind, and so to think that all these things were nothing else but the effects of nature, which in certain periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants, (and in other things subject to her power) these kinds of alterations and mutations. But the counsell of those men, that had approved their understanding and wisedome in times past, was preferred before their opinion. For the assistants supposed that in this deliberation, as also their opinion and counsell was most convenient. They therefore advised that the Ark should be sent back and not retained, and that the five Cities should dedicate five golden statuaes in testimony of their gratitude, because they had been preserved by his favour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impossible to escape; they annexed also so many golden mice unto them, like unto those that spoyled their Countrey. All these locked in a chest and laid upon the Ark, they commanded that a new Cart should be built, and that they should yoak and tie to the same certain Kine that had new calved, locking up their calves from them, least they should be an impediment to their dams, and (to the intent that through the desire to see their young) they should haste the faster. That done, that driving the Chariot and them, they should leave them in a place that had three wayes, and suffer them to draw that way that them listed; and if they took the way of the Hebrewes, and should travell towards their Countrey, they then should assure themselves that it was the Ark which was the cause of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (said they) be driven back again, being most assured that the Ark hath no such vertue in it. This counsell was approved by every one of the Assembly, and presently effected: so having prepared all those things whereof we have spoken, they brought the Chariot into a high way that extended three wayes, and leaving it in that place, they returned back again.

NOw when the Kine entred and kept the right beaten way, and travelled therein no otherwayes then if some men had led them, the Governours of the Philistines followed after them, desirous to understand whither they would travell, and in what place they would rest both themselves and the Chariot. There is a Borough in the Tribe of Juda called Bethsama, towards which they drew: And although they had a very fair Plain before them, yet would they not travell any further, but rested the Chariot in that place. The Inhabitants came unto this spectacle, and greatly rejoyced thereat: for although it was Summer time (wherein every one busied himself in gathering in the fruits of the field) yet so it was, that when they perceived the Ark, they were so transported with the pleasure that they had, that they laid aside the work which they had in hand, and ran presently unto the Chariot. Then taking down the Ark and the Cofer (wherein

Which when the Princes of the Paleſtines perceived, they returned back again into their own countrey. But Gods indignation and diſpleaſure was whetted againſt the Bethſamites: ſo that ſeventy of them were ſlain by reaſon they had touched the Ark, and with prophane hands (not being Prieſts) attempted to ſuſtain it. For which cauſe the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their loſſe, and mourned, for that their Countreymen were extinguiſhed by no fatal death, but by a puniſhment and plague ſent from God, lamenting in particular every one of their alliance. And ſuppoſing that they were unworthy that the Ark ſhould remain with them, they ſent meſſengers to the governours and the reſt of the Hebrewes, to let them underſtand that they
B had recovered the Ark out of the hands of the Philiſtines; who being made privy to every accident, placed the ſame in Cariathiarim, a City, bordering upon the Bethſamites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Levites, called Aminadab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life:) to his houſe directed they the Ark as to a place agreeable unto God, becauſe there dwelled in the ſame a man of ſo much vertue. His ſonnes had the charge of the Ark, and continued in that ſervice for the ſpace of twenty years, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had onely remained four moneths with the Philiſtines. During the time that the Ark was in the City of Cariathiarim, all the people converted themſelves unto God with prayers and ſacrifices, ſhewing great devotion and forwardneſſe in his ſervice. The Prophet Samuel
C perceiving this their readineſſe in courage, and ſuppoſing he had got a fit occaſion to exhort them unto liberty, and thoſe profits which conſequently follow the ſame; and applying his ſpeech unto the opportunity, time and affairs, ſpake unto them ſuch words as founded to this effect: Ye men of Iſrael, ſince at this preſent the Philiſtines ceaſe not to moleſt you, and God beginneth to ſhew himſelf mercifull and favourable unto you: it behoveth you, not onely to be touched with a deſire to recover your liberty, but alſo to endeavour your ſelves to purchaſe the ſame in effect. Beware therefore leſt through your owu manners you make your ſelves unworthy thereof, and let each one of you endeavour to follow juſtice; and expulſing all ſin out of your minds, convert your ſelves in all purity unto God, and perſevere conſtantly in his ſervice. For in doing theſe things, you ſhall ſhortly obtain all felicity, and eſpecially purchaſe unto your ſelves a new liberty, and an aſſured victory againſt
D your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the ſtrength of your bodies, neither by the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtain: for God hath not propoſed rewards for theſe things, but for vertue and juſtice, who (truſt me) will not deceive your expectation, nor fail in the execution of his promiſes. When he had ſpoken after this manner, all the people teſtified their conſent in good words, ſhewing the pleaſure they had conceived by his diſcourſe, promiſing to do that which ſhould be well liking and agreeable unto God. Whereupon Samuel aſſembled them the ſecond time in the City of Maſpha (which word ſignifieth conſpicuous) there erected they an Altar and ſacrificed unto God, and after they had faſted for a daies ſpace, they publickly adreſſed them to call upon the Name of God.
E The Philiſtines in the mean ſpace, who were aſſembled together in the ſame place, had an inkling of that which the Hebrews did, and being certified of this aſſembly, came with a great army and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrewes, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This ſudden attempt of theirs ſore diſmaied and troubled the Hebrews: ſo that they repairing and running unto Samuel, told him that their hearts failed them through fear, and their minds were troubled throtgh the remembrance of thoſe precedent loſſes which they had received: for which cauſe they ought to hold themſelves in quiet, for fear leſt the enemy ſhould inforce his power againſt them. Whileſt (ſaid they) thou haſt led us hither to pray, ſacrifice and offer up our vowes unto God, they are encamped near unto us, being ready to ſurprize us that are naked and diſarmed: we have no other F hope therefore of our ſecurity, but that proceedeth from thee and God; who being moved by thy prayer, may give us means to eſcape from their hands. Samuel in way of anſwer wiſhed them to be of good cheer, promiſing them that God would yield them ſome teſtimony of his aſſiſtance: whereupon ſacrificing a ſucking Lamb for the people, he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to ſtretch forth his right hand for them in this battel againſt the Philiſtines, and that he would not permit them to fall this ſecond time into the enemies hands. To theſe prayers of his, God liſtned with intentive ears, and accepted their humble hearts and dutiful obſervance, ſmiling upon their offering, and promiſing them both force, and victory. Both before the ſacrifice was wholly conſumed with flame, and the ceremonies performed; the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites sight, supposing that the day was already theirs, in that they had intercepted the Jews who were unprepared for the fight (who were not onely disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they been foretold the same, they had scarcely believed it.) For first of all by Gods Commandement the earth trembled under their feet, and with uncertain pace they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were suddenly swallowed up by the earth-quake: at length astonished by often flashes, and having both their eies and hands half blasted and burned by the fiery lightnings that fell (so that they could not wield nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismaied, suddenly set upon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as farre as a place called Corræus, where he fixed and erected a stone or trophee, as a mark both of his owa victory, and the enemies flight, and called the same the strong rock; as a witnesse of the force that God had given him against the Philistines: who after they had received this overthrow, sallied not out any more against the Israelites. But remembring themselves of their fear and those accidents that fell upon them, they remained in peace, offering no further invasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceived and gotten against the Hebrewes, translated it self and remained with the Hebrews ever after this victory. And Samuel led forth his army against them, and slew a great number of them, and for ever abased their pride, taking from them that countrey which before-times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Jews, which countrey extendeth it self from the frontier of Geth, to the City of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

CHAP. III.

Samuel weakned by reason of his old age, cannot any longer govern the State, and committeth it to the administration of his sonnes

NOw when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good form of Government, he assigned them a Citie whither they might appeal, and decide those differences that might fall out amongst them: and as touching himself, he travelled twice every year from City to City, to administer justice unto them, and continued the maintenance of this policy for a long time. But as soon as he perceived himself to be overburdened with years, and unapt to execute his ordinary offices, he surrendred the Government and superintendency of the people up to his sons, the elder of whom was called Joel, and the younger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seat of justice in Bethel, and that the other should give audience at Bersheba, dividing the people, and attributing each part to his particular Judge. In these was there a manifest example and infallible testimonie, that children are not alwaies born like unto their fathers: but that sometimes of evill parents there are good children bred, as contrariwise at that time, of a good father there were evil sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father they followed a quite contrary course, and oppressed justice through corruptions and rewards and swallowed up and surfeited in delights and pleasures, they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should study to live well, and uprightly.

CHAP. IV.

How the people being displeased with the manners and government of the sonnes of Samuel, demanded a King.

M

WHen as therefore the people perceived, that the sonnes of the Prophet had committed so many outrages against their lawes and policy, they were very sore displeased. and had recourse unto their father where he dwelled in the City of Ramathai; where reckoning up unto him the misdemeanours of his sonnes, and how through the multitude of his years, he was unfit according to his accustomed manner to administer the affairs of the Common-weale, they earnestly intreated and besough him, that he would nominate and elect some King over them, who might both command their Nation and Empire and exact due punishment on the Palestines, for their

A their many and too oftentimes offered injuries. This reſolution of the people grievouſly tormented Samuels mind, who by reaſon of his innated and upright Juſtice, miſliked of the kingly authoritie, as a ſtyle and ſtate too imperious: for he greatly delighted himſelf in the Ariſtocracy or government of the elders, deeming no eſtate more conducible, or available for the ſecuritie and proſperitie of the people, then that was. And ſo did this matter diſtemper and diſtract this man, as by reaſon of his care, he could neither taſte food, nor entertain ſleep: but all the night long toſſed and tumbled in his bed, during thoſe times complotting and imagining many things in his mind. Whileſt theſe his indiſpoſitions continued, God appeared unto him and comforted him, willing him not to be aggrieved at that which the people had required: but that he ſhould ſuppoſe that this injury, not onely concerned him, but God himſelf, whom they diſclaimed alſo for their King and ſole Governour over them.

B The effect whereof they had complotted, from the day that they departed out of Egypt: but ere it be long (ſaid he) they ſhall repent themſelves, yet ſhall not their repentance undoe that which ſhall be done; and it ſhall appear by thoſe counſels they have taken, that they have been contemners, and ingratefull toward me by their own confeſſion, and towards thee alſo which haſt been their Prophet. I will therefore that you chuſe them a King, and ſuch a one as I ſhall nominate unto thee, after that thou haſt advertiſed them what evils they ſhall endure (at ſuch time as they ſhall have a King) and haſt publickly declared unto them, what inconveniences follow the charge which ſo vehemently and unhappily they purſue. When Samuel underſtood theſe ſayings, he aſſembled the people about the break of day, and proteſted publickly unto them, that he would eſtabliſh them a King. But ſaith

C he, before I ſhall effect that which you requeſt, I muſt expoſe and declare unto you what eſtate you ſhall live in, being under the ſubjection of royaltie; and how many and grievous evils you ſhall be preſſed withall, by thoſe Kings that ſhall govern you. Know therefore firſt of all, that they will take your children from you, and make ſome of them coachmen, and otherſome horſemen and archers of their guard, others their poſts and tribunes and centu- "rions; ſome likewiſe their handicraftsmen, and armourers, and chariot-makers, and ſmiths, "and forgers of other ſorts of weapons, beſides husbandmen of his fields, and plowers and "diggers of his Vineyards: neither is there any thing which they ſhall not be compelled to "do after the manner of bondſlaves, that are bought with money. They ſhall take your "daughters alſo, and make them their perfumers, cooks and bakers; and they ſhall employ

D "them in all ſervile offices, whereunto their chaimbermaids are to be employed either by "ſtripes or torture. They ſhall take from you your ſubſtance, and give it to their Eunuches "and Guard. They ſhall take your flocks, and diſtribute them amongſt their ſervants: In a "word: you and all yours ſhal ſerve one King, & ſhal be of no better reckoning then the ſlaves "of his houſhold. When you ſhall endure theſe pains, then ſhall you call to remembrance "all theſe things which I have told you, and with repentance you ſhall beſeech God, that "he will have mercy upon you, and give you a ſpeedy deliverance from the ſervitude of your "Kings: but he ſhall not reſpect your prayers, but neglecting and repulſing them, ſhall "ſuffer you to bear the penaltie of your evil counſel. Although theſe future inconveni-

E ences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect and ſet light by them: and not ſuffering that ſiniſter opinion which before that time they had conceived in their minds, to be altered or fruſtrated in them, they inſiſted with all obſtinacy, requiring (without any care of future miſhaps) that they might have a King created over them, becauſe (as they ſaid) it was neceſſary that they ſhould have a King that might wage war with them to revenge them on their enemies, and repreſs their adverſaries forces, and that there was no abſurdity in it, but that they might be governed in the ſame ſort as their neighbours were. Samuel perceiving that his perſwaſions could prevail nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diverted from that reſolution wherein they perſiſted, he ſpake thus: Goe your wayes for this time every one of you unto your houſes, and I will cauſe you to be

The year of the world, 2880. before Chriſts Nativity, 1084.

THere was a certain man of the Tribe of Benjamin, noble in Birth, and commendable in manners called Cis, who had a young ſonne fair in face, great in body; having a ſpirit and judgement far more excellent then were the lineaments and perfections of his body, whoſe name was Saul. This Cis having fair Aſſes, wherein in he took more pleasure then in any other kind of cattell, had lost certain of them which were strayed from the rest of his flock: whereupon he sent his son accompanied with a servant to search and seek them out; who having traversed and travelled in quest of them thorow all his fathers Tribe, journeyed thorow the rest of the Tribes, without any hope or inkling of them: for which cause he determined to return home again, for fear lest his father should conceive some care and grief in his absence. Whilest then he arrived near unto the Citie of Ramatha, the servant that followed him, certified him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whose foresight the knowledge of the truth was subject, towards whom he counselled him to address himself, with assurance and confidence, that by him he should understand what was become of his Asses. Saul replied, that he had no means left to recompence the Prophet, by reason they had consumed all the money they had brought forth with them in their journey. His servant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a sicle, which they might give him: but they were both of them deceived, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew near unto the gates of the Citie, they met with certain Maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gave them directions, telling them that they were to make haste before that he were set down to supper, by reason he at that time entertained divers guests, and he himself was first wont to sit down at the upper end of the table. Samuel had invited this company, by reason that all the day long he had instantly besought God, that he would declare unto him, who it was that should be established: and God also gave him to understand that he would inform him the next day after, and that about the same houre he would send a young man unto him of the Tribe of Benjamin. For this cause Samuel sat in his house expecting the assignation: which being come, he came down under pretence to go to supper, and in the way he met with Saul. At that very instant God signified unto Samuel, that it was he whom he should elect Prince and governour over the people.

Saul addressing himself unto Samuel, besought him that he would shew him the Prophets lodging, by reason that he was a stranger and knew it not. Samuel told him that he himself was the man to whom he spake, and led him to the banquet; assuring him that his Asses (in search of whom he had travelled so long) were in safety, and that all mens goods were at his command. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too base to hope or expect so much; and further, my family is the least of all the families: you therefore jest and mock at me, in speaking of such things as surpass my condition. The Prophet took him by the hand, and brought both him and his servant unto the table, and placed him above all those that were invited, who were to the number of seventie. Samuel commanded that the royall portion should be set before Saul: and when the houre of bed time came, all the rest arose and departed to their houses, but Saul and his servant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as soon as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and departing with him out of Town, he commanded him to send his servant before, and to remain himself with him behind, because he had certain things to impart unto him in private. Hereupon Saul sent away his servant, and Samuel taking a cruse with Oyle, powred the same upon the young mans head, and embracing him, said: Be thou King elected by God against the Philistines, and for the defence of the Hebrews. Thou shalt have this sign which I now shall inform thee of, of thy future honour: When thou shalt be parted from hence, thou shalt overtake three men in the way, who travell to Bethell to adore and sacrifice unto God: the first of which, thou shalt see bearing three loaves, the second shall bear a Goat, and the third shall follow carrying a glass of wine. These shall embrace thee and caress thee: and they shall give thee two loaves, and thou shalt receive them. And from thence shalt thou depart unto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou shalt meet with a messenger, that shall certifie thee that the Asses are found. From thence coming unto Gabatha, thou shalt finde the Prophets assembled in their Congregation, and being ravished by the Spirit of God, thou shalt prophecie amongst them: so that whosoever shall behold thee, shall be ravished in admiration, and shall say: Whence cometh it to pass, that the son of Cis hath attained to so good fortune? and when thou hast had these signes, know that God shall be with thee: salute thy father and thy kinsmen in my behalf. Hereafter thou shalt repair and be sent unto me unto Galgal, to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God. Having in this manner told and foretold him that which is forespoken, he gave him licence to depart: and all these things happened unto Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had prophecied unto him. When Saul was arrived at Abners house, who was his uncle (whom he loved above all the rest of his other familiars:) Abner questioned with him about his voyage, and as touching those things that had chanced unto him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but point by point informed him of all that

A that which had hapned unto him, during his being and abode with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had declared unto him the recovery of his Asses: but as touching the royalty, and those things that concerned the same, he concealed them; supposing that if it should be made known, it would not be believed, but that he should reape hate thereby. For although he were both his friend and cousin; yet thought he it more secure and convenient for him to bury the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himself the infirmity of mans nature, that no man is constant in love, but although by manifest assistance from God, felicity fall upon any man, yet other men do grieve and repine that any one should be preferred before them.

Saul concealed his royal dignity.

The inconstancy of mans love

After this, Samuel assembled the people in the City of Maspha, where he framed his speech
B in such sort, as he certified of those things which he had received from God, namely, that he having procured their libertie, and brought their enemies in subjection under them; next how they were forgetful of so many benefits, and had degraded God of his royalty; as if they were ignorant, that the greatest good that might happen unto men, is to be governed by him that is the soveraign good; how they had determined to have a man to their King, who according to his pleasure and appetite, or according to the unbridled bent of his passion, would use them like slaves made subject unto him, and would usurpe upon their goods without forbearing any thing whatsoever; that men are not so studious to maintain their handy works and labours, as God, who hath an inestimable care of those whom he hath created. Notwithstanding (saith he) since you have thus determined, and are after this manner resolved, and that the outrage which you have enterprized against God, prevaileth
C with you, set your selves all of you in order according to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots. To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin, which being cast the second time, light on the family of Metri, and afterwards being approved by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Cis, to have the kingdome. The young man, who before that time knew what should happen, had stept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seem that he had desired this dignity; and such moderation and temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out, that divers cannot conceale the joy they conceive, if any face of felicity smile upon them; but manifest the same unto all men: yet notwithstanding he not onely was void of vaine appea-
D rance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many worthy people) but that which is more, he stole away from the presence of those men over whom he should command and so handled all things that he made them seek after him, and travel to find him out. Whilest therefore they carefully sought, and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet prayed God that he would shew them where he was, and that he would bring him into their presence: when as therefore he was informed by God in what place he remained; Samuel sent out certain messengers to conduct him thither, and as soon as he came amongst them, Samuel set and placed him in the midst of the people: now was he more high then any of the company by the shoulders; and had a Kingly and good shape and appearance: then spake the Prophet after this manner, God hath given you this man to be your King, behold how he surpasseth you all, and shews himself worthy to be your Prince. But as soon as the people
E had cryed God save the King; the Prophet, who had reduced into writings all those mischiefs that should befall them, read the same unto them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle of God for a perpetual testimony unto posterity of those things which in future ages should succeede, according as he had fore-propheſied: which done, Samuel dismissed the people, and returned to the City of Ramath, which was his countrey. But Saul departing unto Gabatha, divers worthy men gave their attendance on him, and did him the honour that appertained unto a King. But divers seditious and loose companions, who set him at nought, both mocked them, and those things which they did, neither brought they any presents unto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, F any wayes to respect their King. A moneth after this instalment, there fell a warre betwixt him and Naas King of the Ammonites, which was the original of that honour which was generally attributed unto him by the whole multitude: this Naas had offered divers outrages unto those Jewes that dwell on the other side of Jordan. For he had traversed the river with a great and huge army levied against them; and had overcome divers of their Cities. For at that time he used force and violence against them: and to the intent that they might not rebell, neither deliver themselves from his subjection, he used this subtilty and prevention to cut off all colour and occasion from them of opposition. For to those that surrendred themselves, and subscribed to his mercy, and to those that were taken captives, or conquered in the warres, he plucked out their right eyes, and this did he to that intent, that when they ſhould defend themſelves, they ſhould have their left eyes covered with their bucklers, and by that meanes be made unapt to enter battel. The King of the Ammonites having after this manner dealt with thoſe on the other ſide of Jordan, he led his army towards the Galaadites, and encamped near unto their chief citie called Jabes, to which he ſent Heraulds to ſummon the inhabitants to ſurrender the ſame, under theſe conditions: either to ſuffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or elſe by enduring the ſiege, to ſee the final overthrow both of themſelves, and of their Ciry: wiſhing them to make choice of which they liſt, whether they would loſe a little part of their body, or hazard both their fortunes and lives at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this ſo doubtful and dreadful an election, neither durſt return an hoſtile or peaceable anſwer, but asked truce for ſeven dayes, to the end that ſending their meſſengers to their kins-folk, they might crave their aide, which if they could obtain, they would war; and otherwiſe they promiſed to ſubmit themſelves unto the enemy, under what condition ſoever were beſt pleaſing unto him. Naas that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their anſwer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewiſe to crave aſſiſtance at all their hands, who were their aſſociates. Whereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers from City to City, and certified the Iſraelites of all that which Naas had done unto them, and the extremity whereunto they were reduced. The Iſraelites having before time underſtood in what eſtate they of Jabes were, had grievouſly lamented and conceived great diſpleaſure thereat; but the fear that afflicted them, ſuffered them to aſſiſt their friends in no other manner then by commiſeration: yet as ſoon as their meſſengers arrived in the City where Saul was, and that they had recounted unto him the dangers wherewith the Jabeſites were oppreſſed; the people were as in times paſt moved with compaſſion. For they lamented the miſery of their parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the city, perceived the inhabitants drowned in their tears, and enquiring of them for whar cauſe they were ſo confuſed and abaſhed, he was certified of that, which the meſſengers had reported: and on the inſtant he was raviſhed by a divine motion, and ſent the Ambaſſadours back again to thoſe that ſent them, promiſing that within three dayes he would come and ſuccour them, and that he would have the upper hand of the enemy before ſun-riſe, to the end that the riſing ſunne might behold them victorious, and delivered from all fear. The combate and victory of Saul againſt the Ammonites.

Sauls ſerious exhortation and command for war.

Saul deſirous to incite the people to iſſue out and make warre upon the Ammonites to the intent under a penalty he might aſſemble them with more readineſſe, he houghed his own oxen, and threatned all thoſe whom he met withall to do the like unto theirs, except the next day they preſented themſelves with their armes upon the bank of Jordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march unto the place whither by them they ſhould be conducted.

The fear of this penalty publiſhed among the tribes, made them gather to head about the ſame time, ſo that all the aſſemblies of the people were muſtered in the City of Bala. In this ſurvey, beſides thoſe of the tribe of Juda, there were numbred ſeven hundred thouſand men, and of the tribe of Juda in particular, there were ſeventy thouſand. Having therefore paſſed Jordan, and marched ſome ten cubits length of Nilus (which is about ſome three leagues) all the night-time, before the ſunne riſe, he attained the place whither he intended to conduct them, and dividing his army into three parts, he aſſailed the enemy on every ſide, that ſuſpected no ſuch encounter: and fighting valiantly againſt them, he ſlew divers, and amongſt the reſt Naas King of the Ammonites. This victory made Sauls name famous amongſt all the Hebrews, ſo that he was wonderfully praiſed and honoured for his valour: ſo that if before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they changed their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worthieſt of them all. For he was not ſatiſfied to redeem and deliver thoſe of Jabes, but he entered the countrey of the Ammonites alſo, and forraged the ſame with his army, and utterly overthrew them: and after he had obtained a great booty and prey, both he and his victoriouſly and magnifically returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleaſed with this noble action atchieved by Saul, rejoyed becauſe they had choſen them ſo noble a King, and exclaimed againſt thoſe that ſaid, that it would be diſcommodious and unprofitable for their Common-weale, ſaying,

Where

A Where are now these murmurers? let them be put to death: with other such like words, that a people besotted with some good success, is wont to speak and inforce against them that set light by the authors and inducers of the same. Saul received great content and comfort through this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithstanding, he swore that no one of their tribe should be put to death that day, because it would not seem convenient nor agreeable, that the victory which was given them by God, should be mixed with the bloud of their brethren; but rather that it was more decent and comely that the time should be spent in feast and jollity. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behooved them to confirm the kingdom to Saul by a second election: and to that end, they assembled together in the city of Galgal, according as he had commanded: and there in the sight of all the people, Samuel anointed

B Saul the second time with the consecrated oyl, and proclaimed him King anew. Thus was the Aristocracy and government of the better sort amongst the Hebrews, turned into a Monarchie. For under Moses and his disciple Jesus, who governed the Empire and army at that time, the nobility and elected worthy men ruled the State. After whose death for the space of eighteen whole years, the people was without government, the common-weal not long after reassumed her pristine policy, and the government was given unto him, which was esteemed the most valiant in war, and the most upright in doing of Justice. All which time, for this cause, hath been called the time of the Judges.

"beasts to my use, or used his cattel to my profit and his hinderance: in these and such like if "I have offended any man, let him now accuse me in the presence of the King. All of them
"cried out with one voice, that no such default had been committed by him, but that he had "governed their nation in holiness and justice. After that the people had thus publickly te-D "stified in the behalf of Samuel; he said unto them: Since you have liberally and freely pro"tested, that you have no cause of wrong to urge or inforce against me, hear I pray you, that "wherewith I can justly accuse you. You have grievously offended against the Majestie of "God, in that you have required a King at his hands: you should have rather remembred, that "your old father Iacob accompanied only with his 70. sons came into Egypt, constrained "thereunto by famine, and that in that countrey divers thousands of persons issued from his "loyns, whom the Egyptians kept in captivity, offering them extreme outrages: And when

"as your fathers called upon God, how he wonderfully delivered them from the necessities
"wherein they were, without giving them any King, contenting themselves with two bro"thers, Moses and Aaron; who brought and conducted you into this countrey which you pos"sess at this present. And although you participated these benefits by the hands of God, yet

E "notwithstanding you have not forborn both to forget religion, and neglect piety. This "notwithstanding, at such time as you have been conquered by your enemies, he hath set you "free; gracing you first of all with the overthrow of the Assyrians and their Forces: secondly,
"giving you victory over the Ammonites, and Moabites: and finally over the Philistines.
"Now these great exploits were performed by you, not under the conduct of a King, but by "the direction of Iephta and Gedeon: what folly therefore hath bewitched you to flie from "God, and to seek to live under the subjection of a King? But I have named such a one unto "you, whom God hath chosen to be your Governour. Notwithstanding, to the intent that I "may give you a manifest testimony, that Gods wrath is whetted against you, because you

F "have desired to have a King; I will strive to express it unto you, by visible signs done by "God himself. I will therefore require of God, that he will make you see in this place, and "in the heart of summer such a storme, that there is not any one of you, that hath ever seen
"the like thereof: Scarce had he spoken the words, but that suddenly there fell great store of lightning, thunder and hail, in approbation of that which the Prophet had said: so that amazed and transported with fear, all of them confessed that they had offended. They notwithstanding professed that their errour was of ignorance, not of obstinacy, and besought the Prophet, that with a good and fatherly affection, he would beseech God to appease his wrath towards them, and forgive them their offences at that present, which to their other grievous negligences they had annexed, and whereby they had transgressed his holy will.

All which Samuel promiſed them to do, and beſought God that it would pleaſe him to pardon them the errour which they had committed in that behalf, and that it would pleaſe him to be appeaſed by his prayers. Beſides this, he exhorted them to live uprightly, and to keep in their continual remembrance what evils had hapned unto them, for that they had forſaken the way of vertue; and what wonders God had done, and what laws he had given by Moſes, all which they ought to meditate on, if they deſire to be in ſafety, and live happily with their King. But if they ſhould contemn the ſame, he foretold them, that both themſelves and their Kings ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed. Samuel having prophecied theſe things unto the Hebrews, diſmiſſed them to their own dwellings, after he had confirmed the kingdom unto Saul the ſecond time.

CHAP. VII.

The Paleſtines, aſſailing the Hebrews, are overcome in battel.

1 Sam. 13. v. 1, ad 4. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 6 Saul elected two thouſand for his own guard, and one thouſand for Jonathans. Saul overcometh the Philiſtines.

But when the King had muſtered his men, and choſen out three thouſand of the choiſeſt ſouldiers, he appointed two thouſand of them for the guard of his Perſon, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The reſt he gave in charge to his ſon Ionathan, and ſent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there; who, followed by them, valiantly overcame a garriſon of the Philiſtines near unto Gebal. For the Philiſtines of Gaba having gotten the upper hand over the Jews, had taken their armes from them, and ſeized and fortified both with men and munition the ſtrongeſt Cities of their countrey; prohibiting them to bear arms, and in general from the uſe of any Iron: by reaſon of which inhibition, if their husbandmen had at any time need of any Iron work, as of plough-ſhares, mattocks, or any ſuch other inſtrument fit for manuring or tillage of their lands, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongſt the Philiſtines.

v. 5. The Philiſtines prepare to invade the Iſraelites.

Now when the Philiſtines had gotten ſome intilligence, that their garriſon was after this manner defeated, they were wonderfully moved, and ſuppoſing amongſt themſelves that the injury and out-rage was in no ſort to be ſuffered, they armed themſelves againſt the Jews, and went out embattelled with three hundred thouſand footmen, thirty thouſand charriots, and ſix thouſand horſe, encamping with their whole hoſt neer unto the Citie of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrews underſtood, he marched toward the City of Galgal: and as he travelled thorow the countrey, he animated and encouraged the people to recover their liberty, proclaiming war againſt the Philiſtines; whoſe forces he ſo little feared, as he mocked thereat, ſaying, that they deſerved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrew by their encountry. But when Sauls ſouldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly diſcomforted, ſo that ſome of them hid themſelves in dens and places under the earth; otherſome fled on the other ſide of Jordan into the countrey of the Gadites and Rubenites. But Saul ſent for the Prophet, reſolving to conſult with him upon the eſtate of the warre, who gave him anſwer, that he ſhould attend in the ſame place where he was, and that he ſhould prepare beaſts for ſacrifice, becauſe that within ſeven dayes he would come unto him and ſacrifice on the ſeventh day: which done he might encounter the enemy. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet obſerved he not entirely all that which Samuel had enjoyned him. For when he perceived that he was ſomewhat ſlack in coming, and that his ſouldiers waxed weary, he took the beaſts that were prepared for the ſacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards underſtanding that Samuel was arrived, he went out to meet him, and do him honour. Samuel told him, that he had done amiſs, by reaſon he had neglected that which was commanded him, preſuming before his arrival (who was ſent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer prayers and ſacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both diſcovered his raſhneſs, and diſorder in ſacrificing. Saul excuſed himſelf, alledging that he had ſtaied during the terme of ſeven dayes which were appointed him: urging further, that neceſſity, and the depart of his ſouldiers, together with the fear of the adverſe army which were in Machmas, and the intelligence he had received that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer ſacrifice. Samuel replyed, ſaying, Thou hadſt done more adviſedly, if thou hadſt obeyed, and not contemned God by thine overhaſte, whoſe miniſter and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mighteſt both have gotten an aſſurance and continuance of thy kingdom to thy ſelf, and ſucceſſion to thy poſterity. This ſaid, being diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, he returned back to his own houſe, and Saul with

A with ſix hundreth ſouldiers (onely accompanied with his ſon Ionathan) came unto the City of Gabeon. The greater part of theſe men were diſarmed, by reaſon that the countrey was intirely deſtitute of Iron; and workmen that were expert and skilfull in forging and making armour: for the Philiſtines permitted them not to have any, as we have declared a little before. Theſe dividing their army into three battels, invaded the countrey of the Hebrews, by ſo many wayes, deſtroying and forraging all things, both in the ſight of King Saul, and of his ſon, who neither could inhibite their incurſions, nor by reaſon of their multitudes make head againſt them. Both he therefore and his ſon, and Achias the high Prieſt, ſate them down upon a hillock, and ſeeing the countrey ſpoiled round about them, they were much diſmaied. But Sauls ſon conſpired and concluded with his Eſquire and Harneſs-bearer, to enter ſecretly
B into the enemies camp, and raiſe an uprore & alarum in the ſame; who willingly promiſing and offering him his ſervice to adventure with him in all occaſions and places, with the hazzard of his life: they both of them deſcended from the mountain, and marched directly towards the enemies camp, who had pitched their tents on a high pointed rock, which extended it ſelf in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a bank, as it were a wall and fortification againſt the incurſion of their enemies. For which cauſe they kept their watch ſomewhat too careleſly, becauſe the place was fortified by nature: ſo that no man might aſcend, or aſſail them, but with diſadvantage. When as therefore they had gotten near unto the camp, Ionathan incouraged his companion, and animated him to aſſail the enemy after this manner. If (ſaith he) they eſpy us, and will us to aſcend, let us take this ſum-
C mons of theirs for an aſſured token of victory: but if they hold their peace, and call us not, let us return back again.

v. 22,23. The Paleſtines ſpoil the countrey of the Hebrews.

1 Sam. 14.1, ad 4. Jonathan with his Harneſs-bearer do privily enter the enemies camp.

As therefore they approached the enemies hoaſt, about the beginning and break of the day, the Philiſtines ſaid the one unto the other: The Hebrews creep out of their caves and dens. Then cried they out to Ionathan, and his Harneſs-bearer, ſaying: Come hither, come hither unto us, to the end we may plague you according to your audacious enterprize. Sauls ſon quickly taking hold of theſe their words, and eſteeming them for an ominous and an aſſured token of victory, departed with his Eſquire from the place where they were firſt diſcovered, anſwering them that he would ſhortly viſit them. So withdrawing himſelf on the otherſide of the rock, which by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, was left unguarded: overcoming the difficulty of the place with great labour; at laſt they attained the place where
D the enemy was, whom they found aſleep, and aſſailing them ſlew twenty of them, and filled the whole army with terrour and amazedneſs: ſo that caſting away their weapons they fled amain: ſome others being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, invaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themſelves that onely two Hebrews durſt never aſcend and enter their camp, they addreſſed themſelves to their mutual murther and ſlaughter: ſo that ſome of them were ſlain, others fled to eſcape the ſword, and fell headlong down the Rocks. But when as the Kings eſpials had told him what confuſion and diſorder was befallen in the camp of the Philiſtines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were abſent: and hearing that his ſon and his Harneſs-bearer were miſſing, he com-E manded the high Prieſt, that attired in his pontificial ornaments, he ſhould prophecy that which ſhould ſucceed: who aſſuring him that he ſhould obtain the victory over his enemies, he ſallied out and aſſaulted the Philiſtines, and ran upon them, who were thus confuſed and diſordered, and whetted the one againſt the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes ſuch, as before times were fled into dens and places under ground, as ſoon as they heard that the victory inclined on Sauls ſide: ſo that gathering together to the number of ten thouſand Hebrews, he purſued his ſcattered enemies thorow all the countrey. But afterward, a great inconvenience hapned unto Saul, proceeding from the joy he had conceived by this victory (for commonly ſuch as are bleſſed by ſuch good fortunes, are not ma-F ſters of their own affections and reaſons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to ſatiate himſelf with revenge for all thoſe injuries which he had received from the Philiſtines, he publiſhed an imprecation or curſe amongſt the Hebrews, againſt any one whomſoever, that intermitting the chaſe and ſlaughter ſhould take ſuſtenance before night, purpoſing until dark night neither to give over purſuite or ſlaughter. This execration thus publiſhed by Saul, it chanced that his ſon that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his Father, nor the general ratification and allowance of the ſame by the people, ſallying into a certain grove, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many ſwarmes of Bees, he by chance light upon a honey-comb, and preſſing the honey thereout, afterwards did eat the ſame. Afterwards having intelligence that his Father had under a grievous penalty of execration, forbiden any man to taſte any ſort of meat before ſun-ſet, he gave over eating further: yet said he, that his father had done amiss therein in publishing that prohibition, by reason that if they had received sustenance, they might with greater force and forwardness pursue the enemy that fled, and overtake and slaughter them in great number. Killing therefore many thousands of the Philistines partie, about the evening they began to ransack and spoil the camp of the Palestines, and bore away from thence great spoils, and a wonderful number of cattel, part of which were slain and eaten with the bloud, contrary to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and signified to the King, how the people had offended against God, by slaughtering the beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either washt or purified from the bloud; Saul commanded that a great stone should be rowled into the midst of the place, and commanded the people to kill and sacrifice their beasts upon the same: and that they should forbear to eat the flesh with the bloud, because it was not agreeable unto God. All which was performed according as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offered a burnt sacrifice unto God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assail the enemies camp, and sack all that was therein before the day-spring, whilest his men of war diligently followed him, and shewed great forwardness in the execution of his command: the King asked counsel of the High Priest Achitob, whether God would give him the victory, and permit those that should enter the enemies camp, to return from thence with victory. The High Priest certified him that God returned him no answer: which when he understood; It is not without cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to give a willing answer in that which we ought to do: but there must needs be some hidden sin in us, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be silent.

But I swear by the same God, that although mine own son Jonathan had committed that sin; to the end I may appease God, I will with no less severitie execute him, then any one stranger that is neither by alliance nor affinitie tied unto me. Now when the people cried out, and encouraged him to the performance of that he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and he standing with his son apart, began by casting lots to find out him that was faultie. Now when the Lot fell upon Jonathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his own conscience he was guiltie of? To whom he answered, I know no other thing, but that yesterday being in pursuit of the enemy, and ignorant of thine edict, I tasted of an honey combe: but Saul swore that he would slay him, setting more by his oath, then either by kindred, nature, or affection. He nothing astonished with this present perill, with a generous and dreadless mind, presented himself with this reply: O father (said he) I entreat no favour at thy hands: for I will willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly because I have seen so famous a victory: for I shall die throughly contented to see the insolency of the Palestines overmastered by the power of the Hebrews. This valour and courage of the young man moved the whole multitude to remorse and commiseration; so that they swore all of them that they would not suffer that Ionathan, who was the Authour of so famous a victory, should be slain: and therefore rescued they the young man from his displeased father, and made vows unto God, to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul, after he had slain about sixe thousand of his enemies, returned with victory to his own home, and raigned afterwards very happily, and overcame by force the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans Amalechites, and King Oba that dwelt near about him. He had three sons, Jonathan, Josuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob, and Michol. The Generall of his Army was Abner the son of his uncle called Neer; for Neer and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and sons of Abiel. He was very rich both in Horse and Chariots, and against whatsoever enemy he marched forth, he alwayes returned with victory; so that he reduced the affairs of the Hebrews to happie estate, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those Nations that neighboured upon them. But the chiefest of the youth, that either prevailed in strength or exceeded in beautie, he chose to be of his guard.

A fore(ſaid he)doth God command thee. Since the Amalechites offered many injuries unto the Hebrews in the deſart, whileſt in their departure out of Ægypt, they travelled into that region which they now inhabite; it behoveth thee to puniſh them by a moſt juſt warr: and having overcome them, that thou utterly extinguiſh their memory, without regard either of ſex or years; and this revenge ſhalt thou execute upon them, in repayment of thoſe injuries they in times paſt offered to our fore-fathers. Neither ſhalt thou ſpare either beaſt or horſe, or flock, to apply them to thy profit or particular uſe: but thou ſhalt conſecrate all unto God, and according as Moſes commanded it, deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All theſe things did Saul promiſe to perform, and ſuppoſing obedience conſiſted in this, not onely in the acting, but alſo the ſpeedy execution of that which was enjoyned B him, he preſently aſſembled all his forces together, and muſtering his ſouldiers at Galgal, he found about fourty thouſand, beſides the Tribe of Juda, which of it ſelf afforded and allowed thirtie thouſand men: with theſe did Saul enter the countrey of the Amalechites, and laid divers ambuſhes near unto a river, not onely to afflict them with open and hoſtile warre, but alſo to encloſe and ſurprize them at unawares, and kill them amiddeſt their high wayes: He charged them therfore, and put them to flight, and diſcomfited their whole Armie, purſuing them that fled. Which execution of his, having that anſwerable ſucceſs (according as God had promiſed him before) he marched onwards, and beſieged the Cities of the Amalechites, and overcame ſome of them by batterie, ſome by Mines and countermures C raiſed on the outſide: otherſome by famine and thirſt, and divers other wayes. And in thoſe Cities which he overcame, he neither ſpared women nor children, neither ſuppoſing their murther to be cruell, neither inhumane: firſt, for that he executed it upon his enemie; next, for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandment, towards whom his diſobedience might redound to his utter overthrow. He took Agag priſoner alſo, who was the King of the Amalechites, whoſe beautie and perſonage ſeemed unto him ſo well proportioned and perfect, that he wondered thereat, and thought him worthy to be kept alive, and that not by Gods commandment, but overcome by his own affection, uſurping upon an ungranted priviledge of mercy to his own prejudice: For God ſo hated the Amalechites, that he ſpared not their Infants, who ought in naturall compaſſion to have been more pitied then the reſt. But Saul kept alive the King of his enemies, and the Authour of all the He- D brews evils, ſetting more by his beautie then Gods commandment. This ſin of his the people preſently imitated: for they ſpared both horſe and other kind of cattell, and made prey of them, notwithſtanding that God had charged them to reſerve nothing. They carried away with them all other moveables and riches, and onely conſumed thoſe things which were of ſmalleſt value by fire. This victory had Saul over thoſe people that dwell betwixt Peluſium, whith is a Citie on the borders of Egypt, unto the Red Sea. But he medled not with the Sichemites, which inhabit in the midſt of the Madianites, whom before the battell he had commanded to retire themſelves, leſt they ſhould partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied unto them, by reaſon of Raguel, Moſes father in Law; the Hebrews had cauſe to procure their ſafety. Saul having obtained this victory, and re- E joycing at his good ſucceſs, returned to his own home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his war with the Amalchites; but as if he had preciſely obſerved all that which was enjoyned him. But God was ſore diſpleaſed, both for that the King of the Amalechites was preſerved, and for that the people had made prey of their cattell: for both theſe actions of theirs were expreſly againſt Gods permiſſion. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortall King, that they ſhould neglect and contemn his Laws and Decrees, by whoſe onely means they were furthered and favoured in their victory. For which cauſe God told the Prophet Samuel that he repented him in that he had choſen Saul for their King, conſidering that he infringed his commandments, and governed himſelf according to his own appetites. When Samuel heard theſe words, he was ſore troubled, and beſought God all the night long, that F he would appeaſe his wrath and diſpleaſure conceived againſt Saul: but notwithſtanding all the importunities, and prayers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no ſort be reconciled, becauſe it was inconvenient that the ſinnes, which were committed by Saul, ſhould be remitted by Samuels ſubmiſſion and interceſſion. For ſinne never more augmenteth and increaſeth, then when ſuch as are offenced are too remiſſe in their puniſhments: for whileſt they would be reputed both for good and merciſull, they themſelves both unawares, and unwittingly, become the authours of ſinne. When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his requeſt, and it manifeſtly appeared that no prayers or ſupplication might appeaſe him; as ſoon as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at that time remained action may be reputed good, but in reſpect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God H

BUT Saul willing to retain Samuel, took hold of his garment, and for that the Samuel violently withdrew himſelf from him. To whom the Prophet ſaid, that in like ſort his kingdom ſhould be rent from him, and that another who was more honeſt and upright, ſhould take poſſeſſion thereof: for God continued in his determination intended againſt him, becauſe that to change and varie opinion is humane paſſion and not divine puiſſance. Saul anſwered, that he had grievouſly ſinned, but it was im-poſſible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithſtanding beſought him, that in the preſence of the people he would as yet do him honour, at ſuch time as he ſhould walk with from that day forwards he never more came into the Prophet Samuels preſence, who was heartily ſorry for his fall: But God commanded him to give over his care, & that taking with him the ſacred Oyle, he ſhould repair to the Citie of Bethleem to Jeſſe the ſonne of Obed,

A and that there he ſhould anoint one of his ſons for king, according as he had commanded him: and when as the Prophet ſaid that he was afraid, leſt Saul getting notice thereof, ſhould either by treaſon or open force ſeek to ſlay him, being encouraged and aſſured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed town. In that place was he ſaluted with great concourſe of people, and each of them inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither: who anſwered them that he came to offer ſacrifice unto God. Now when the oblations were performed, he invited Jeſſe and his ſons to banquet with him; and beholding the eldeſt of them to be fair and well proportioned, he conjectured by his ſtature and ſeemlineſs, that it ſhould be he that was to be elected king; but in this matter he attained not the ſcope of Gods providence. For demanding whether he ſhould anoint that young man, whom in admiration he
B thought ſo worthy of the kingdom: it was anſwered him, that men ſaw not in ſuch manner as God doth. For thou (ſaid he) beholding the beauty of the young man, ſuppoſeſt him worthy of the kingdom: but I prize not royaltie and government of eſtate, by the beauties of the body, but by the vertues of the ſoul: and him require I that is perfectly furniſhed herewith, and hath his mind beautified with piety, juſtice, obedience and fortitude. Upon theſe words, Samuel commanded Jeſſe to bring all his other ſons into his preſence, who preſented him with five others, the eldeſt of which was called Eliab, the ſecond Aminadab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fifth Rael, and the ſixth Aſam. Now when the Prophet beheld theſe likewiſe no leſs beautiful men then was the eldeſt, he asked of God which of them he ſhould chuſe for king; he anſwered him that he ſhould chuſe neither of them: for
C which cauſe he enquired of Ieſſe, whether he had any other ſons beſides them: who told him that he had one which was called David, who had the care and cuſtody of his flocks. Him did the Prophet ſuddenly command him to ſend for, alledging that it was impoſſible for them to ſit down to the banquet, except he were preſent. Now when David was arrived, according as his father had commanded him; Samuel ſeeing him fair in colour, quick in eye, and otherwiſe anſwerable to his natural ornaments: This is he (ſaid he in private to himſelf) who is accepted and elected by God to be our king. This ſaid, he ſate down at the table, and made the young man to ſit above him, and both Ieſſe his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruſe of oyl in the preſence of the ſaid David, he anointed him, and told him in his
D ear, how God had choſen him to be king, and exhorted him to ſtudy juſtice, and to be obedient to that which ſhould be commanded him: aſſuring him by that means, that his kingdom ſhould be of long continuance, his family and ſtock ſhould be famous and renowned, and that he ſhould overcome the Philiſtines, and conquer thoſe Nations againſt whom he ſhould fight, and obtain glorious renown in his life time, and leave the ſame to his ſucceſſours as an inheritance. Samuel having made this exhortation, departed from him, and the Spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entred into David, ſo as he began to Prophecy, by means of a divine ſpirit wherewith he was ſeized: whereas on the otherſide, Saul was tormented with ſtrange paſſions of the evil ſpirit, whereby he fell into ſtrange ſuffocations, and ſtranglings: ſo as his Phyſicians could not invent any remedy for him, but gave counſel that ſearch
E ſhould be made, if a man might be found that were expert and cunning in ſinging and playing on the harp, to the end that when the evil ſpirit ſhould aſſault and trouble him, he might ſtand at his head, and both with voice and inſtrument ſing ſacred hymns before him. And when as the king had given preſent and ſpeedy command, that ſuch a one ſhould be ſought after, one of thoſe that were aſſiſtant, told him that he had ſeen in Bethleem a ſon of Ieſſes, a young man of excellent feature, and beſides his other good parts and bringing up, very cunning both in ſong and playing on the Harp: and beſides that, addreſt enough and toward in feats of arms. He therefore ſent meſſengers to Ieſſe to command him to withdraw David from the folds, and to ſend him unto him, becauſe that having heard report of his beauty and valour, he was deſirous to ſee him. This command of his did Jeſſe obey, and F ſent his ſon with preſents unto Saul the king, who greatly rejoyced upon his arrival, and made him his penſioner, and honoured him divers wayes. For he was refreſhed by him, and was his only Phyſician againſt the vexation of evil ſpirits, at ſuch time as they ſeized and poſſeſſed him: for by reciting and ſinging Pſalms upon his Harp, he reſtored the king to his right minde: he therefore requeſted Jeſſe that he would ſuffer him to live with him, and attend upon him, becauſe he was ſo much delighted with his preſence, whereunto he condeſcended, permitting him to dwell with the king.

CHAP. X.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. 1 Sam. 17. 1. &c. Another expedition of the Paleſtines againſt the Hebrews.

NOT long time after this, the Philiſtines aſſembled themſelves, and gathered together great companies of men of war; with whom they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and ſubdued all that which is between Sucoth and Azeca, where they encamped. Saul on the other ſide led forth his Army againſt them, and encamping himſelf upon a certain mountain, he conſtrained the Philiſtines to diſlodg from their firſt camp, and entrenched themſelves upon another mountain right over againſt that where he pitched his tents. The camps being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended it ſelf between both the armies: Into this there deſcended a certain man called Goliah, a Gittite, of huge ſtature, being four cubits and a ſpan-length in height, having his limbs covered with huge and mighty armour: for his curetes which he bare on his back, weighed five thouſand ſicles; his helmet and pouldrons were of braſs, made fit to cover his maſſie members; the ſpear which he bare in his hand was no light lance, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, and the head thereof weighed ſix hundred ſicles, and after him there followed divers men bearing arms. Now when he came betwixt both the Armies, he ſtood up and cried with a loud voice, addreſſing his ſpeech to Saul and the Hebrews in theſe termes: Hebrews, what need you to hazard the doubtful fortune of war? Single me out an adverſary, and let us determine by our two hazards, on whoſe ſide the victory and conqueſt ſhall fall: ſo that whoſeſoever ſouldier ſhall be overcome, let his party be adjudged ſubject to their ſides who have the victory: for it were better that ſome one among you, then the whole Army ſhould be brought in hazard. When he had ſpoken thus, he returned back to his own camp. The next day he came forth again and uſed the ſame words, and thus for fourty dayes ſpace ceaſed he not to defie the Hebrews in ſuch like words, and under the ſame conditions: ſo that both Saul and his Army were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelves alwayes ready and arranged in battel, although the fight was begun on neither ſide. During the time that Saul addreſſed himſelf to this expedition, he ſent David back again to Ieſſe his father (contenting himſelf with his other three brothers, who at that time ſerved under his royal ſtandard) where he intended his intermitted care of keeping his flock: But whileſt the war was rather protracted then performed, whither his father had ſent him to carry victuals to his brothers, and to know how their affairs went in the army, and whileſt that David deviſed with his brothers, as touching thoſe things which his father had committed to his charge: he heard the Philiſtine blaſpheming and railing upon the Hebrew army, and was therewith ſo greatly moved, that turning himſelf unto his brothers, he told them that he was ready and addreſſed to fight hand to hand againſt that enemy. But Eliab the elder brother reproved him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardy then became his age, and that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to return unto his father, and intend his flocks. David for the reverence he bare unto his brother, departed from thence, and meeting with certain ſouldiers, ſaid unto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud Challenger: which they preſently ſignified unto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeek him out. Now when he came before his preſence, he asked him what he intended to do? O king (ſaid he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy fear overmaſter thee. For I am he that will abate the pride of this enemy, and encounter and enter combate with him: and how great and high ſoever he be, how elate and fierce ſoever he ſhew himſelf; I will ſubdue him, and turn his terrour to deriſion: and ſo much the more ſhall the glory, and the honour of thy army be enhaunced, by how much ſo great and expert a man at arms ſhall be ſubdued by a young man, and an unexperienced ſouldier. Saul amazed at his hardineſs, and great courage; yet notwithſtanding, ſuſpecting him by reaſon of his years; told him that he was too feeble to encounter a man ſo expert in feats of arms: whereunto David made this anſwer, That which I promiſe you (my ſoveraign) is under the aſſurance which I have in God, which heretofore I have proved, and the ſuccour which at other times I have received at his hands. For whiles I fed my fathers flocks, I redeemed a lamb that was raviſhed out of my fold, out of the lions jaws; and catching the wilde beaſt by the tail, that with open mouth aſſaulted and ſought to devour me, I beat him to the ground, and ſlue him: neither with leſs ſucceſs invaded I a Bear that ſet upon my flock; and as light do I ſet by this monſter alſo: who vomiting out his ſlanderous raylings both againſt God, and men, ſhall neither eſcape the divine arm of juſtice, which he ſo wickedly provoketh, neither flie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him.

So

A So much prevailed this forward readineſſe in the young man, that the King beſeeching Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſhed him with a royal armour, a ſword and a helmet, and ſent him forth to the battel. But David feeling the weight of his armour, and ſeeming rather to be loaden then defenced with the ſame, ſaid unto him: Let theſe armes (O King) ſerve to incloſe and defence thy body, who art able to bear them, and ſuffer me I beſeech thee, who am thy ſervant, to fight according to mine own fantaſie. He therefore laid up his armour, and took a ſtaffe in his hand, and five ſtones which he gathered on the banks of the torrent, which he put in his ſcrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemy. Now when the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorn he asked him whether he thought him to be a dogge, that he thus came forth to fight with him, with weapons fit to B ſcare dogges? Nay (ſaid David) I eſteem thee worſer then a dogge (which ſo much perverted Goliahs patience, that he curſed the name of his god, thundring out threats, that he would caſt out his carcaſe to be devoured by the beaſts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But David anſwered, Thou comeſt againſt me with thy ſword, thy javelin, and curets: but contrariwiſe, I march out againſt thee under the warrantiſe and protection of God, who ſhall deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole army, for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy body to the dogges whom thou reſembleſt, and all men ſhall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrewes, and that our armes and forces are the cares that it pleaſeth him to have of us, and that all other furniture of war is unprofitable, except it be aſſiſted by God. The weight of the Philiſtines armes hindred him from C marching readily: ſo that he marched foot by foot towards David, contemning him, and truſting that he ſhould kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, as alſo becauſe he was young, and tender in years.

CHAP. XI.

The ſingle combate betwixt David and Goliah, and the ſlaughter of the Philiſtines that followed after.

D David ſet forward to make head againſt the enemy, being aſſiſted by a companion whom he ſaw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the ſtones, which he had gathered on the banks of the torrent, out of his ſcrip, and having fitted it to his ſling, he forced it againſt Goliah, and gave him ſuch a ſtroke on the forehead, that he pierced him to the very brain: ſo that Goliah fell down ſuddenly dead, and he running upou him as he lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his own ſword: for he himſelf had none. As ſoon as he was ſtrooken down, diſcomfiture and flight ſeized all the army of the Philiſtines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed warriour amongſt them overthrown and ſlain, they began to ſuſpect the general iſſue of their warre, and reſolved to retire from thence; ſo they took their flight in diſorder and confuſion, ſuppoſing by that meanes to deliver themſelves out of dangers. But Saul and the whole army of the Hebrewes ſallied out againſt them, with great ſhouts and cries, and in the purſuit made a great ſlaughter of them, and F drave them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Aſcalon. In this battel there died on the Philiſtines ſide above thirty thouſand, and the reſt that were hurt and wounded, were twice as many. Saul returning back into his camp, pillaged and burnt their tents; but David bore Goliahs head into his pavillion, and hung his ſword in the Tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame unto God. But Saul afterward conceived a privy hatred againſt David, upon this occaſion which enſueth: For whereas he returned triumphant like a conquerour with an army, and the women and maidens ſinging and dancing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meet him; The women ſung that Saul had ſlain divers thouſands of the Philiſtines; and the virgins anſwered, that David had ſlain divers ten thouſands. Which when Saul underſtood, and ſaw that the leſſer teſtimony of thouſands E was referred to him, and that the ten thouſands were attributed to David, he ſuppoſed that after ſo glorious a renown, there wanted nothing for David, except to be King. For which cauſe he began to fear and ſuſpect him: ſo that by reaſon of the feare he had of him, he thought that he was too near his own perſon, and therefore from being one of the chiefeſt in authority about him, which was to be one of his chief Commanders and guard, he made him Captain over a thouſand, rather reſpecting his own ſecurity, then the others honour; to the intent that being often charged by incurſions of the enemy, he might by ſome diſaſter be deprived of his life. But David having in all places the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, returned turned alwayes with good ſucceſſe and happy iſſue: ſo that for the excellency of his valour, the people intirely loved him; and Sauls daughter alſo, that was about that time marriage-able, began to be inamoured with him, and ſo great and apparent was her affection towards David, as the certain notice thereof came unto her fathers eares, who was ſore diſpleaſed therewith, yet hoping by that means the ſooner to intrap him, he gave ear thereto with ſome ſhew of allowance, and told them who diſcovered their loves unto him, that he would willingly give him his daughter to wife, under preſence that the enjoying of her might be the means of his utter overthrow: For (ſaid he) I am content to give him my daughter in marriage, under that condition, that he bring me ſix hundred enemies heads; and he deſirous to get ſo high and famous a reward, and in like ſort to obtain honour, by an act both ſo dangerous and admirable, will undertake the execution thereof, and ſhall be ſlain by the hands of the Philiſtines, and that intention which I have conceived againſt him, ſhall ſucceed according to mine own hearts deſire: for I ſhall be delivered of him, in ſending him out of the world, not by my means, but by other mens hands. Further, he charged his Courtiers to ſound and ſeek out Davids reſolution, and how he was affectioned towards marriage: who began to deviſe with him, telling him that the King bare him a moſt intire favour, and that the people admitted him, and how they ſhould procure him the marriage of the Kings daughter. Whereunto David replyed; Think you it to be a ſmall matter to be ſon in law unto the King? for my ſelf I eſteem otherwiſe, conſidering in eſpecial mine own baſe condition, who have neither reputation nor any honourable quality. When Sauls ſervants had related unto him what anſwer David had made them: Tell him (ſaid he) that I neither want goods nor preſents (for that were to expoſe my daughter to ſale, and not to match her with an husband.) I ſeek for a ſonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue, ſuch as is manifeſt and apparent in thee: and my deſire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou give me neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers houſe; but the puniſhment of the Philiſtines, and ſix hundred of their heads, which ſhall be the moſt deſired and accepted dower thou canſt preſent me with. Saul under covenant of 600 Philiſtines heads promiſeth David his daughter.

When theſe words were reported unto David, he was very joyful, thinking that Saul ſpake ſincerely of this affinity: and without delay, or taking counſel or deliberation, whether the thing were eaſie or impoſſible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to go and find out the enemy, and execute the condition, under which the marriage was promiſed him. For it was God that made all things eaſie and poſſible to David, for after he had ſlain divers of them, and cut off ſix hundred of their heads, he returned and preſented them to the King, and in conſideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

CHAP. XII.

1 Sam 18. 27, &c. Saul marrieth Michol to David.

But Saul that could not fly from his promiſe (for fear leſt it ſhould be a great diſhonour for him to be found a liar or to have promiſed David his daughter under colour, either to murther him, or to draw him to the execution of things that were impoſſible) delivered his daughter Michol unto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that mind. For perceiving that David was gracious in Gods ſight, and in good reputation among the people, he was afraid of him: and being unable to conceal his fear he had conceived, to be deprived of two things of ſuch conſequence, as were his kingdome and life, he reſolved to kill David; giving commiſſion to his ſonne Jonathan, and divers other of his ſervants to execute the ſame. But Jonathan amazed to ſee this change in his father, who inſtead of the ſingular good liking he had of David in times paſt, ſought to hurt David, not in any ſlight ſort, but by endangering his life: and on the other ſide being ſingularly affected towards him, and reſpecting of his vertue, he communicated the ſecret and deliberation of his father to him, counſelling him to have care of himſelf, and to fly upon the next morrow, and that in the mean while he would go and ſalute his father, and as ſoon as the occaſion preſented it ſelf, he would ſpeak and conſer with him, to know the cauſe of his conceived diſpleaſure againſt him, to the intent he might pacifie the ſame: ſuppoſing it to be a matter unreaſonable, that he ſhould be deprived of life, to whom the people were ſo much indebted, and who in particular was his eſteemed and vowed friend:

CHAP. XIII.

How the King practiſed to murther David.

B THe next day after, Jonathan came unto Saul, and finding him merry and well diſpoſed, he began to ſpeak unto him to this effect, as concerning David. In what fault (O father) either great or ſmall have you found David guilty, that you have ordained and commanded him to be done to death? who is ſuch a man, as "for the conſervation of your own perſon, hath been very profitable, and beſides that hath "prejudiced the eſtate of the Philiſtines, and inhanced the honour of the people of the He- "brews, and hath delivered them from that diſgrace and mockery, wherewith they have been "curbed for the ſpace of fourtie years: ſo that he onely hath dared, and oppoſed himſelf "againſt the proud defies of the enemy; and ſince that time hath brought ſo many of the "Philiſtines heads as was commanded him, in recompence whereof he hath had my ſiſter to "wife: ſo that his death ſhould be a great diſpleaſure unto us, not only by reaſon of the vertue C "wherewith he is endowed, but alſo through occaſion of his alliance with us in blood and "conſanguinitie. For by his death your daughter ſhall partake part of the injury, by rea- "ſon that ſhe ſhall ſuffer incommodity of widowhood, before ſhe hath taſted the fruits and "commodities of marriage. Weigh theſe things, and pacifie your diſpleaſure, and do no "wrong unto ſuch a man, who firſt of all hath been the author of your ſo good and great "fortunes, as is the conſervation of your perſon at ſuch time as you were poſſeſſed and tor- "mented with evill ſpirits, and hath brought to paſs that your furies are allayed: and ſecond- "ly, hath revenged you of your enemies. For it is a thing unworthy either your Majeſtie, or "the name of a man, to forget good deſerts. With theſe words was Saul pacified, ſo that he ſwore unto his ſon that he would not injure David: for his juſt perſwaſions and arguments D were more ſtronger, then the choler and fear of the King. Jonathan ſent to ſeek out David, and told him theſe good and happy tidings from his father, and brought him unto him, where he lived and remained in ſort as he did before time.

CHAP. XIV.

How hardly David eſcaped the ambuſhes that were often laid for him by the King; yet having him twice at advantage and in his power, would not murther him.

E ABout the ſame time, whileſt the Philiſtines led forth their Army anew againſt the Hebrews, Saul ſent out David againſt them accompanied with his forces, who encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and returned unto the King with a great victory. But Saul entertained him not, both as he deſerved, and the happy exploit atchieved by him did merit; but deſpited and envied his good actions and honourable deſerts, as if Davids happy ſucceſs had been Sauls diſadvantage and prejudice. But at ſuch time as the evill ſpirit returned anew, and both ſeized and vexed him, he lodged him in his own chamber where he lay, and having at that time a javelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his harp, and to ſing hymnes. Now whileſt David executed that his commandment, Saul ſtretching out his arm, threw his dart at him: but David foreſeeing it, avoided the ſtroke, and fled into his own houſe, where he ſojourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the King ſent out certain of his ſervants to F watch his houſe for fear leſt he ſhould eſcape, to the end that the next day being drawn and appearing in judgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, Davids wife and Sauls daughter, having intelligence of her fathers intention, ran unto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he and ſhe were, who without his preſence neither could nor would live any longer. Beware (ſaid ſhe) leſt the ſun find thee in this place, for he ſhall no more behold thee here hereafter. Flie therefore whileſt the preſent night offereth thee opportunitie, which God doth lengthen for thy ſafety ſake: for be aſſured that if thou be ſurprized in this place, my father will make thee die a miſerable death. This ſaid, ſhe let him down by a window, and ſo ſaved him; and incontinently after, ſhe prepared his bed, and trimmed it as if he lay ſick therein, and under the covering thereof ſhe laid the G liver of a new ſlaughtered kid; and when her father had ſent the next morning to apprehend David, ſhe anſwered that he had been ſick all the night long: then diſcovering the bed that was covered, ſhe gave them to underſtand that David was laid therein, making them touch the coverlet under which the liver ſtirred, and made them believe that the liver that lay there was David, who panted and breathed very hardly. Which being ſignified unto Saul, he commanded that he ſhould be brought unto him in that eſtate wherein he was, becauſe he was reſolved to put him to death. But when Sauls meſſengers were arrived and returned thither, and had diſcovered the bed, they perceived Michols ſubtilty, and went and certified the King thereof: who reproved her very grievouſly for that ſhe had ſaved his adverſary, and deceived her father. But ſhe defended her ſelf with words full of good appearance, ſay- H ing, that David had threatned to kill her; and how for that cauſe, and by the impulſion of fear, ſhe was drawn and induced to aid and ſave him. For which cauſe ſhe ought to be pardoned, ſince by conſtraint and not of ſet purpoſe ſhe had furthered his eſcape. For (ſaid ſhe) I think that you ſeek not ſo greedily after the death of your enemy, as to prefer the ſame before the ſafetie and ſecuritie of your daughter. On theſe perſwaſions Saul pardoned his daughter.

v. 14. Michol perſwadeth the kings ſervants that David is ſick.

v. 17. Michol excuſeth her ſelf for delivering David.

David delivered from this perill came unto the Prophet Samuel to Ramatha, and told him what ambuſhes the King had laid for him, and how hardly he had eſcaped death by the ſtroke of his Javelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, he had alwayes ſhewed himſelf obedient: again, how he had never ceaſed to war upon his enemies, and had by Gods aſſiſtance I been fortunate in all things, which was the cauſe that Saul was ſo diſpleaſed with him. The Prophet informed of Sauls injuſtice, forſook the Citie of Ramath, and led David to a certain place called Galbaath, where he remained with him. But as ſoon as Saul was informed that David was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he ſent out certain ſouldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him unto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were ſeized with the Spirit of God, and began to Prophecie.
Which when Saul underſtood, he ſent out others, who had the like encounter with the firſt. For which cauſe he ſent out others, and ſeeing the third company Prophecie like-wiſe, he was in the end ſo much deſpited, that he came thither in his own perſon. And when he drew near the place, before that Samuel ſaw him, he made him propheſie; ſo that Saul coming towards him, was ſeized by abundance of Spirit: ſo that he was raviſhed out of him- K ſelf, and having deſpoyled himſelf of his rayment, he lay proſtrate all the day and the night long in the preſence both of Samuel and David. David departed from thence, and went unto Jonathan, to whom he complained of thoſe ambuſhes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithſtanding, he had never committed either injury or fault againſt his father, yet did he earneſtly purſue him to put him to death. Jonathan perſwaded him that he ſhould neither raſhly ſuſpect theſe things, nor be overcredulous in thoſe reports which perhaps might be brought unto him, but that he ſhould truſt him onely; who was aſſured that his father intended no evil againſt him: For if he had, he would have told him, who is never wont to act any thing without his counſel. But David ſware unto him that it L was ſo, and beſought him that he would believe his unfained aſſertions, whereby he might the more eaſily procure his ſecurity, leſt contemning his words, and ſuppoſing them to be fained and frivolous, he ſhould by his death be aſcertained of the ſight and truth thereof: For he aſſured him that his father for that cauſe did not communicate his counſels with him, becauſe he was aſſured of the love and friendſhip that was between them. Jonathan ſore aggrieved, that David was ſo perſwaded, and Sauls intention was ſuch, asked him what he deſired at his hands, or wherein he might ſhew him friendſhip? David ſaid unto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou maiſt, and refuſe me in nothing. Now to morrow is the firſt day of the moneth, in which I was accuſtomd to dine at the kings table, & if thou thinkeſt good,
I will depart out of the city into the field, where I will lie hidden: if he ask for me, thou ſhalt M ſay I am gone into the Countrey of Bethleem, where my Tribe ſolemnizeth a feaſt; thou ſhalt certifie him alſo that thou haſt given me leave. And if he ſay God ſpeed him, which is an ordinary wiſh; that friends uſe to ſuch as go a journey, know, that he hath no hidden rancour, nor ſecret malice conceived againſt me; but if he anſwer otherwiſe, it ſhall be an aſſured teſtimony that he complotteth ſome miſchief againſt me: and this ſhalt thou aſcertain me of, as both becommeth my preſent calamity, and our mutuall friendſhip, which by vowed oath, thou being my Lord, haſt plighted with me who am thy ſervant: And if thou think me unworthy of this favour and injurious towards thy father, without expecting the ſentence of his juſtice, kill me now at this preſent with thine own ſword. Theſe his laſt words ſo grievouſly

A grievously strook Jonathan to the heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request, assuring him to certifie him if he any wayes could perceive that his father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be believed, he caused him to walk forth with him into the clear and open aire, and there sware unto him that he would not pretermit any thing that might tend to the conservation of David. For (said he) that God that filleth and moderateth all things in this wide-spread universe, and who, before I speak, knoweth my mind: he, I say, shall bear witness of that accord which shall be ratified between thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father, till such time as I know and have conceived his intention, and that I have entered into his secrets to know what sickness his soul is seized with, and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceal it from thee, but give
B thee notice thereof, be it that he be appeased or displeased against thee. The same God knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be assistant unto thee, as also he is at this present: and that he abandon thee never, but make thee Lord over thine enemies, yea though it were my father, or my self. Onely remember me in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children, and be as favourable towards them, as I am affected to thee-ward at this present. After he had sworn this oath, he dismissed David; willing him to conceal himself in a certain place of the Plain, where he ordinarily exercised himself: For that as soon as he understood his fathers mind, he would return thither with his Page, and if (saith he) having shot three shafts at the mark, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them back again to me, for that they are right before
C him, know thou, that thou art to expect no evil from my father: but if thou heares me speak to the contrary, think thou that my father is incensed and mis-affected towards thee; yet howsoever it happen, I will do my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwayes then we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such time as thou shalt obtain thy happy dayes, and be thou favourable unto my children. David being confirmed by Jonathans promises, retired himself to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnity of the new moon, after the King was purified according to the custome, he sat down to take his repast: Now when his son Jonathan was set on his right side, and Abner the Generall of his Army on the left, Saul perceived Davids place was void, and spake not a word, supposing that he was absent from that company, by reason he was not pu-
D rified since he had the company of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new moon that he was absent likewise, he asked his son Jonathan, why Jesses son both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at that feast: who answered him, that he was gone into his countrey (prosecuting the story, according as it had been concluded between them) alledging that his Tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assist the same. Further (said he) he invited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assist the feast, for you know how entirely I love the man. At this time knew Jonathan the displeasure his father had conceived against David, and perceived most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceal his choler, but began to rail upon his son, calling him Rebel and his enemy, and companion and confederate with David, telling him that he shewed
E reverence neither to him, nor to his mother, since he was so minded: and that he would not believe, but that as long as David lived, their Royal estate should be alwayes in continuall disturbance: He commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do justice upon him. Jonathan replied, What evil hath David committed, for which he should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choler in words and disgragraces, but taking hold of a javelin, he assaulted him, and would have slain him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained b his friends. At that time did Jonathan cleerly discover the hatred that Saul bare towards David, and how instantly and seriously he sought his ruine, since well-nigh for Davids sake he had slain his own and eldest son. Then did Jonathan withdraw himself from the banquet, seeing with how little profit he had pleaded, and so much was he grieved that he ceased not to weep, and the rather since well-nigh
F his father had unkindly slain him: And seeing that David was adjudged to die, he passed all the night long without sleep, and about the day-spring he departed out of the Citie, to the appointed field, making a shew that he walked out to take his exercise; but indeed it was to discover unto his friend the intent which his father had, according as it was covenanted between them. After that Jonathan had done that which he had promised, and sent back his Page into the City, he came unto David, both to see and speak with him in private; who, as soon as he perceived him, cast himself prostrate at Jonathans feet, calling him the conserver and maintainer of his life. But Jonathan lifted him up from the earth, so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutual kisses for a long time, lamented

David flying from the King, and the war which he made againſt him, retired himſelf to the City of Nob to Achimelech the Prieſt: who ſeeing David come alone unto him without either friend or ſervant, was amazed; and deſired to know the cauſe why he thus wandred without any attendance. David told him that the King had ſent him about ſome ſecret execution, which might not be communicated unto him, although he were deſirous to know it: and as touching my ſervants, (ſaid he) I have commanded them to attend me in this place. He further required him, that he would give him ſuch things as were neceſſary for his voyage that he had to make, wherein he might perform the part of a friend, in ſuccouring him at ſuch time as he had need of him. There being known by the Kings ſervants, he was diſcovered and noted to be that David, that had ſlain many thouſand Philiſtines. David fearing to be put to death by him, and considering how deservedly they oppress, but onely giving credit without proof to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage, not on those they ought to punish, but those that may most easily be depressed and overthrown. The manifest example hereof appeareth unto us in Saul the son of Cis: who after the government of the Nobilitie was extinct, and the supream magistracie of Judges was dissannulled, being the first created King of the Hebrews, onely for that he suspected Achimelech, he slew three hundreth Priests and Prophets, and after he had slain them, destroyed their Citie with fire; and as much as in him lay, deprived the high Temple of God, not onely of Priests, but sacred Ministers; and after so hideous a slaughter, neither spared their countrey nor any of their off spring to be left alive. But Abiathar Achimelechs sonne, who onely escaped with life amidst all his slaughtered family, flying unto David, declared unto him both the overthrow of his family and the death of his father. David answered him, that he expected no less then that which happened, at such time as he espied Doeg there, who as his mind gave him, would not fail to reprove and scandall Achimelech to Saul: yet took he it on him, that the misfortune happened unto his friend by his means: he therefore prayed him to remain with him, because he could not be concealed or secured in any place better then with himself.

David defendeth Cilla against the incursions of the Philistines. 1 Sam. 23. 1, 2, 3, and 7.

About the same time, David understanding that the Philistines made a road into the Countrey of Cilla, and preyed the same, determined to assault them, if after the Prophet had asked counsel of God, he should be by the Oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordingly falling out, he sallied out accompanied by his friends, and set upon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recovered a very rich prey, and gave convoy to the Cillans, till such time as they had safely gathered in, and housed all their corn and fruit. The rumour of this his exploit was presently brought unto Saul: for this noble act and happy execution was not onely not shut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renown thereof was dispersed every where, both in other mens ears, as also in the Kings, and both the Action and the Authour thereof were highly commended. Saul was very joyfull to hear that David was in Cilla, and said thus: God hath delivered him into my hands, by enforcing him to shut up himself within a Citie inclosed with Walles, Gates, and Barres: whereupon he suddenly gave commandement that all the people should march against Cilla, and besiege the same, and surprize or kill David.

v. 7, 8. Saul seeketh to besiege David in Cilla.

v. 9, 10, 11, 12. David admonished by God, flieth from his danger.

But David having intelligence hereof, and advertised by God, that if he stayed among the Cillans, they would deliver him into the hands of Saul, he took with him his four hundreth men, and retired himself from the Citie into the desart, and encamped on a defenced hill called Engaddi: so that the King being advertised that he was fled from the Cillans, ceased to issue out in arms against him. From thence David departed to a certain place of the Ziphians, where Jonathan, Sauls son, met with him, and after he had embraced him he exhorted him to be of good courage, and to conceive an assured hope of future good fortune, and not to give place to his present miseries, by reason that he should obtain the Kingdome and should have the whole power of the Hebrews subjected unto him; but that such things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great travels: and after they had once more renued the oath of mutuall and lasting amitie and faith between them, during all the time of their lives, calling God to witness with imprecations against him, that should contradict, or in any sort change those conventions; Jonathan left David somewhat eased in heart, and disburthened of his conceived fear, and that done, returned to his own home.

v. 13, 14. David came with his army to Carmi or Ziphi, where Jonathan cometh unto him, comforteth him, and renueth his covenant.

v. 19 The Ziphians certifie Saul of Davids abode in their countrey.

But the Ziphians intending to gratifie Saul, told him, that David was amongst them, and promised him to deliver him prisoner into his hands, if so be he would issue out against him: Insomuch as if he would seize all the streights of the Countrey, it should be impossible for him to flie into any other place. The King praised their forwardness, and promised them to requite their loyalty, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection, and withall sent out certain men to seek out David, and to beak over the forrest, promising them that shortly he would follow after them. Thus did the Governours and Princes of the Ziphians offer themselves unto the King to search out and apprehend him, expressing their affection therein, not onely in outward shew, but also with their whole power labouring what they might, that surprizing him, they might deliver him to the Kings hands. But their unjust desire had as unfortunate success: who being to incur no perill by concealing him from pursuit, promised to betray into the Kings hands, through adulation and avarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his enemies. For David being made privie to their malice, and ascertained of the Kings approach, leaving

A thoſe narrow ſtreights wherein they then encamped, eſcaped to a certain rock which is ſcituate in the deſarts of Simon: Neither deſiſted Saul to purſue him; for knowing by the way that he had overcome the ſtreights, he came to the other ſide of the rock, and David had ſurely both been taken and circumvented, had not the King been revoked by fearful tidings, which aſſured him that the Paleſtines had forcibly entred and ſpoiled his kingdom. For he thought it more convenient to revenge himſelf on thoſe his hoſtile and ſworn enemies, and to give ſuccour to his countrey and people, being ready to be ſpoiled and waſted, then under deſire to lay hands on a private enemy, to betray both his countrey and ſubjects to their ſwords; and thus was David ſaved beyond all expectation, and retired himſelf to the ſtraights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulſed the Paleſtines, certain news was brought him
B that David dwelt in the ſtreights of Engaddi: whereupon, preſently taking with him three thouſand of the choiſeſt men in all his army, he led them ſpeedily to the forenamed place, and being not far from thence, he perceived neer unto the high-way a deep, hollow, large, long and open cave, whereas David with his four hundreth men might be hidden, and deſcended himſelf alone into the cave to disburthen the neceſſities of nature. This was preſently diſcovered by one of Davids followers, who told him that GOD had preſented him a fit opportunity to revenge him on his enemy, and counſelled him to cut off Sauls head, and to diſcharge himſelf thereby of much trouble and torment; who ariſing and finding him out, onely cut off the lap of the veſture wherewith Saul was attired, and preſently thereupon repented himſelf, ſaying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by ele-
C ction had raiſed to the eſtate of Majeſtie and Empire. For (ſaid he) although he be unjuſt toward me, yet ought I not to be injurious towards him.

But when Saul was iſſued out of the cave, David went out after, and cryed with a loud voice, beſeeching Saul that he would give him audience: who turning back unto him, he caſt himſelf proſtrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the cuſtome, and ſpake after this manner; "How unworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy ears to "ſcandalous backbiters, and giving truſt and credit to vain and looſe men, thou ſuſpecteſt "thy moſt tried friends, whom thou rather oughteſt to judg by their ſincere and upright acti-"ons? for words may be either falſe or true, but the minde may be diſcovered by none more "apparent arguments then by mens actions: as at this preſent thou maieſt judg, whether

Or with what eys thinkeſt thou doth God behold thy cru-"elty, who requireſt his death, who having occaſion and opportunity offered him to be re-"venged on thee, ſpareth thy life, whoſe life were it in thy hands, were aſſuredly loſt? For as "eaſily might I have cut off thy head, as this lap of thy garment (and therewithall, in confir-"mation of his words, he ſhewed it him) yet did I forbear this juſt revenge: yet contrariwiſe
"art not thou afraid to exerciſe thy unjuſt tyrannies againſt me. But God ſhall bear witneſs E "hereof, and ſhall approve which of us both are of more peaceable behaviours. Saul amazed to ſee how ſtrangely his life had been preſerved, and raviſhed to conſider the natural mildneſs and moderation in David, began to weep, and David wept alſo: but Saul ſaid that he had greater cauſe to lament then he. For, ſaid he, by thy means have I received many benefits, and thou at my hands haſt been repaied with infinite injuries. This day haſt thou teſtified that thou retaineſt the ancient juſtice of thy progenitors, who commanded that their enemies ſhould be diſmiſſed with life, at ſuch time as they were ſurprized in the deſart: now am I throughly perſwaded that God hath reſerved the kingdom for thee, and that the Empire of all the Hebrews attendeth thee. Aſſure thou me therefore by an oath, that thou wilt not exterminate my race, neither remember thee of thoſe injuries I have done unto thee, but that ſparing my poſterity, thou warrantize and keep them under thy protection. Da-

About the ſame time died Samuel the Prophet, a man who by his merit was in great eſtimation amongſt the Hebrews, the famous teſtimony of whoſe vertue, and the peoples obſervation towards him, was expreſſed in this, in that they celebrated his funeral, and ſet out his ſepulchre with great pompe: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented him many dayes, not after the manner of a common or forraign miſery, but as if each one of them had in particular a prejudice and loſs to lament for. For, he was a man that was naturally framed to all juſtice and goodneſs, and for theſe his vertues moſt acceptable able unto God. He governed the people after the death of Eli the high Prieſt, firſt in his own perſon, for the ſpace of twelve years, and afterwards during the reign of Saul eighteen years, whoſe death hapned (as I ſaid) about this time. But in thoſe places where David at that time remained, there was a certain Ziphian in a town called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattell. For he had a troop of three thouſand ſheep, and a heard of a thouſand Goats. On theſe did David command his people to commit no waſte; neither through deſire, nor neceſſity, nor hope of concealment, they ſhould do him any hurt. Charging them moreover, that they ſhould offer no wrong unto any man, becauſe that to violate and take another mans goods, was both unlawful and wicked, and contrary to Gods commandement. He inſtructed them in this ſort, imagining with himſelf, that he ſhould gratifie a good man, and ſuch a one as deſerved to be in like ſort favoured: but Nabal (for ſuch was his name) was a rude and curriſh perſon, leading his life in hunting; yet had he a wife that was good, wiſe and fair. Nabals flocks ſaved by David. v. 6.

v. 7, ad 12. Davids embaſſage to Nabal to require relief, and his curriſh anſwer.

To this Nabal did David ſend ten of his ſervants about the time of his ſheep-ſhearing, both to ſalute him, as alſo to wiſh him all good, and to beſeech God, that for divers years he would grant him grace to do the like. Mean while he requeſted him, that he would impart unto him ſomewhat of that which was in his power, when as his ſhepheards could inform him, that having long time remained in the deſart, we have (ſaid they) been ſo far off from doing your flocks any harm, as we have rather ſeemed to be their ſhepheards and keepers: they promiſed him likewiſe, that whatſoever courteſie he ſhould ſhew unto David, he ſhould beſtow it on a mindful and thankful perſonage. Thus ſpake the meſſengers unto Nabal: but he anſwered them very diſcourteouſly, and rudely, demanding of them what that David was? and being informed that he was the ſon of Jeſſe: Now, (ſaid he) theſe fugitives and ſlaves forſaking their Maſters, live proudly and inſolently. v. 13. ad 17. David ſallieth out againſt Nabal with 400 armed men.

David, hearing of this report, was grievouſly diſpleaſed, and commanded four hundreth of his men to take up their weapons and follow him, commanding two hundreth to keep the baggage (for at that time he had ſix hundreth) and in this equipage marched he forward againſt Nabal, ſwearing, that that very night he would utterly exterminate and root out all his race, and ranſack his riches. Neither was he onely diſpleaſed for that Nabal was ingrateful towards them, without reſpect of that humanity which they had ſhewed towards him, and his: but alſo, for that without any cauſe of injury offered, he had injured and outraged him in words.

à v. 18, ad 35. Abigal Nabals wife appeaſeth David with preſents.

In the mean while, certain ſhepheards that attended Nabals cattel, told their Miſtreſs their Maſters wife, that David having ſent unto her husband to require ſome ſmall courteſie, had not onely obtained nothing, but alſo received inſupportable injuries, whereas till that day he had ſuffered his flocks to be untouched: telling her, that that inſolency of their Lord, might breed them all much woe and miſery. Which when Abigal heard (for ſo was the woman called) ſhe loaded divers Aſſes with all ſorts of preſents (without making any motion to her husband, who was ſo drunk that he was inſenſible) and went towards David. As therefore he deſcended the ſtreights of the mountain, David encountred her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with four hundred men. As ſoon as Abigal perceived him, ſhe leaped from her Steed, and falling upon her face, ſhe proſtrated herſelf before him, beſeeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was anſwerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal ſignifieth folly: ſhe excuſed her ſelf likewiſe, ſaying, that ſhe ſaw none of them that were ſent unto her husband. K L

v. 25. Nabal ſignifieth a fool.

A and finding her husband amidst his other companions, loden and overwhelmed in wine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day when he was sober, certifying him thereof, he lost all his forces, and his body became mortified through the grief he conceived at her words, so that some ten days after and no more, he departed out of this life. Which when David understood, he said that he was deservedly punished by God, because that his own wickedness was the cause of his punishment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who received the injury were unstained with bloud: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can escape Gods judgment, and that all humane affairs are not rashly disposed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodness, and the wicked punished according to their wickedness. He afterwards sent messengers to
B his wife, and caused her to come unto him, to the intent he might marry her, and take her to his wife. She answered the messengers, that she thought her self unworthy to lie at his feet: notwithstanding, she repaired to him with all her furniture and means whatsoever, and was married to David, having obtained that degree of honour, both in that she was modest and just, as also for that she was beautiful. Now David had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the city of Abesar.

As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gave her to wife at Lissa, to the son of Phalti of the city of Gethla. After this, certain Ziphians coming unto Saul, told him that David was returned again into their countrey, and that, if it pleased him to assist them, they might easily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul issued with three thousand
C armed men, and being surprized by night, he encamped in a certain place called Siceleg.

When David was certified that Saul was issued forth against him, he sent out certain Spies, whom he gave in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired, who ascertained him that he was at Siceleg; he watched all that night without the knowledg of any of his followers, and went into Sauls camp, attended only by Abisai his sister Sarvia's son, and Achimelech the Chittite.

Now whilest Saul was asleep, and both his General Abner with all his souldiers wholly devoured in drowsiness, David entred into the Kings camp: and although he knew the Kings pavilion, by reason of his Javelin that stood at the door thereof, yet slew he him not, neither permitted he Abisai, who was both willing and addressed to execute the slaughter, to perform
D it. But this he said, that although the King were evil, yet notwithstanding, it were a strange and undecent thing for him, to slay him who was Gods elected: for that it was Gods right to take revenge on him, to whom he had given the kingdom: and thus restrained he the others unbridled fury. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that having the opportunity to slay him, he spared his life; he bare away with him his Javelin, and the pitcher of water that stood by Saul whilest he slept, without the witting or knowledg of any of the camp: so much were they devoured and overwhelmed with sleep. He therefore departed thence in all assurance, having executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to do. But after he had passed the river, and had attained the top of a mountain, from whence he might be easily heard, he cried out to Sauls souldiers, and their General Abner so strongly, that he awaked them from their sleep; and calling unto Abner, as well as the com-E mon sort of souldiers, the General asked who it was that called him: to whom David answer- It is I, the son of Jesse, your fugitive: but, said he, How cometh it to pass, that thou who art so great, and in chiefest authority about the King, hast so small respect and guard of his person? Thy sleep is more pleasant unto thee then thy watch for his conservation. Assuredly this act of thine deserveth a capital punishment, because thou neither hast discovered me, nor any others before we entred the camp, or approached the King. Seek for the Kings Javelin and his pitcher of water, and thou shalt perceive in what great danger he hath been, even in the midst of you, without any notice or discovery of yours.

Saul perceiving that it was Davids voice, and conceiving that how being in his hands
F (whom he had surprized in the depth of sleep, through the negligence of his guard) he had not slain him, but pardoned his life, although it justly lay in his power to take his head from him, he said, that he gave him thanks, and acknowledged his life from him, exhorting him to be assured, and without suspect of any evil to return home unto his house, because he was perswaded, that he loved not himself so much, as he was intirely affected by David; notwithstanding that he had pursued him, and for a long time past had chased him like a fugitive, constraining him also by divers afflictions and great torments of spirit, to be abandoned from his dearest parents and friends: yea from David himself, who might have preserved him, and who had given him divers demonstrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had been oftentimes preserved; whom notwithstanding he ceased not to

Saul having this ſecond time eſcaped from Davids hands, returned to his royal houſe. But David, fearing leſt if he ſojourned in that place, he ſhould be intrapped by Saul, thought good to retire himſelf into the countrey of the Philiſtines, and ſojourne there. So that accompanied with ſix hundreth men which he had with him, he tranſported himſelf to Achis King of Geth, one of their fiue cities; who received him with all his people, and gave him a place to dwell in: ſo that he abode in Geth, having with him his two wives, Achimaas and Abigal. Which when Saul underſtood, he made no more account to ſend or ſally out againſt him, becauſe that two ſeveral times he had been in danger of his life, at ſuch time as he purſued him to intrap him. David held it not convenient to remain in the city of Geth, and therefore requeſted the King of the Philiſtines, that ſith he had courteouſly entertained him, it might pleaſe him likewiſe to do him the favour to aſſign him a certain place in his countrey, where he might make his habitation, becauſe he feared to be chargeable to him, if ſo be he remained in the city. Achis aſſigned to him a village called Siceleg, which David after he obtained the kingdom, loved and honoured, holding that for his own demain, as his own children and heirs did after him. But hereof will we ſpeak in another place. The time that David lived amongſt the Philiſtines and in the town of Siceleg, were four moneths and twenty dayes; during which time, by ſeveral and ſecret excurſions againſt the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he ſpoiled their countrey and returned back again with a great booty of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bondmen, leſt Achis by their means ſhould have intelligence of his enterprize. He ſent likewiſe a part of the prey unto the King, and when he demanded from whom he had taken the ſame, he anſwered that he had taken it from the Jews that dwelt Southward and in the Plain, perſwading him that he had done no loſs: ſo that Achis conceived an opinion, that ſince David warred againſt his own nation all the time of his aboad with him, he would be a faithful ſervant unto him. About the ſame time, the Philiſtines having determined to lead forth their army againſt the Iſraelites, ſent out to their allies, requiring them to aſſiſt them in that war, and to make their Rendezvous at Renga, to the intent that being there aſſembled, they might diſlodg and aſſail the Iſraelites. Amongſt the other their auxiliary companies, Achis had requeſted David to aſſiſt him, with his ſix hundreth ſouldiers: which he promiſed willingly to perform, telling him, that the opportunity was now come wherein he might requite his courteſie, and the hoſpitality he had ſhewed him. Achis promiſed him that after the victory, when as all things had ſucceeded according as he deſired, he would prefer David to the guard of his perſon; thinking by the promiſe of this honour and truſt, he might augment Davids forwardneſs and affection toward him. Being thefore ſore troubled herewith, he fought counſell at Gods hands as touching the event of the battel: and ſeeing he returned him no anſwer, his heart more and more failed him, in that he manifeſtly perceived what ſiniſter ſucceſs would betide him, if God ſhould not aſſiſt him in the conflict. B After then, that by his oathes and proteſtations he had perſwaded her, that ſhe ſhould have no cauſe to fear, he commanded her to raiſe the ſpirit of Samuel. She not knowing what Samuel was, called him from hell, and he ſuddenly appeared. But when ſhe perceived that it was an honourable man, and of divine ſemblance, ſhe was ſore troubled; and being wholly diſcomforted with this viſion, ſhe turned and ſaid unto the King: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no leſs. Saul confeſſed that it was he, and asked her for what cauſe ſhe ſeemed to be ſo much troubled? She anſwered, that ſhe ſaw a man aſcend that reſembled God. Saul commanded her to declare unto him his ſhape, habit, and age: and ſhe gave him to underſtand that he was a reverend old man, attired in the veſtment of an high Prieſt. By theſe marks Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, proſtrating himſelf on the earth, he adored and ſaluted him. The ſpirit of Samuel asked him for what cauſe he had troubled and raiſed him? To whom he complained and lamented that he was inforced thereunto by neceſſity: for that a grievous hoaſt of his enemies were at hand, and that void of counſel, he was forſaken by God, having from him no prediction, either by prophecy or dream: for which cauſe, ſaid he, I made my recourſe unto thee, who haſt alwayes had care both of me and my fortunes. But Samuel foreſeeing that the Kings death was hard at hand, anſwered him, that it was in vain for him to queſtion with him, as touching thoſe things that ſhould happen, ſince thou knoweſt that thou art forſaken by God. Know therefore, ſaid he, that David ſhall poſſeſs the Kingdom, and that it is he that ſhall eſtabliſh the eſtate by armes: but as concerning thy ſelf, thou ſhalt loſe both thy Kingdom and thy life, becauſe D thou haſt diſobeyed God in thy war againſt the Amalechites, and haſt not obſerved his commandements, according as I foretold thee at ſuch time as I was alive. Know therefore, that thy people and hoaſt ſhall be diſcomfited by the enemy, and that both thou and thy ſons ſhall be to morrow ſlain in the battel, and be with me. When Saul underſtood theſe things, he became ſpeechleſs, through the ſorrow wherewith he was ſeized, and fell down on the pavement, either for that his forces failed him through ſudden grief, or for his want of meat; becauſe that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchſafed his body any refection or ſuſtenance.

v. 22, &c. The Enchantreſs intreateth him to refreſh himſelf, and take ſome refection.

At length, hardly recovering himſelf out of his ſwoun, the woman importuned him to receive ſome ſuſtenance, beſeeching him to do her that favour in recompence of her unexpected divination; which though interdicted, ſhe had adventured to perform for his E ſake (before ſhe were aſcertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in conſideration whereof, ſhe prayed him, that ſitting down at the table, he would refreſh himſelf with ſome ſuſtenance, to the end he might be the more able to return unto his army. And although he reſiſted and utterly refuſed to eat, in that he had no appetite, and was utterly deſperate; yet ſo effectually importuned ſhe, that finally ſhe perſwaded him to receive ſome little nouriſhment. And whereas ſhe had but one calf which ſhe bred up in her houſe with ſome particular care (for ſhe was but a poor woman, and had no other riches) yet ſpared ſhe not to kill it, and dreſs the fleſh for Saul and his ſervants. Thus refected, Saul returned back again into his camp. The courteſie of this woman deſerveth to be praiſed: for, although ſhe knew F that the King had prohibited her art, whereby both ſhe and her family ſufficiently maintained themſelves: and although before that time ſhe had never ſeen Saul; yet ſo it is, that without remembring her that it was he by whom her art had been condemned, ſhe entertained him not as a ſtranger, or like the man ſhe had never ſeen before; but had compaſſion on him and comforted him, exhorting him to eat, although he refuſed it, and preſented him willingly and heartily with that little which ſhe had in her poverty. All which ſhe did not under hope of recompence, or expected preferment (knowing well that Saul ſhould ſhortly loſe his life) nor according to the ordinary courſe of men, that naturally honour thoſe that have beſtowed ſome dignity upon them, and become ſerviceable to thoſe from whom they pretend to draw ſome profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth peareth an excellent example of bounty, approving that there is nothing more worthy praise, then to relieve those that are in necessity; neither any thing more becoming men, or whereby we may obtain Gods favour and graces, better then by it. Thus much sufficeth at this present, in respect of this woman. But now methinketh I shall do well if I insert in this place, and in these my writings, an other example both profitable to people and Nations, and in special an incitation to Noblemen, and such as are born unto glory, to follow vertue; which also shall express what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memory, which ought to engender in the hearts of Kings of Nations, and of Governours of Common-weals, a singular desire and affection to addict themselves to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertain dangers, yea death it self, and teach them to endure all difficulties whatsoever, for their Countries cause. To which intent, the history of Saul king of the Hebrews yeeldeth me matter most accident to this purpose: For, although he knew that which should befall him, and that his death is at hand (according as it had been foretold him) yet resolved he not to avoid the same; neither so loved he his life, that for the conservation thereof, he would deliver up his people into the hands of their enemies, nor dishonour his Royal dignity: but himself, with his children and all his household, exposed themselves to danger; thinking it more honourable to die with them in fighting for his subjects, and far more expedient that his children should die like valiant men, then to leave them alive in incertitude of estate, whereinto they might fall, supposing that he should have sufficient successours of his race, if he left behinde him a perpetual memory and praise both of him and his. For which cause (in my opinion) he was both just, strong, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like unto him, I suppose that it becometh all men to give testimony of such a mans vertue. For I think that the Historians and ancient Writers, have not worthily intituled them with the stile of valiant men, who attaining some worthy actions, attempted war under assured hope of victory and safety, but they onely, that imitate Saul, may deservedly be called just, praise-worthy, couragious, hardy, and contemners of all dangers. For what great thing is there in undertaking of the common hazzard of war, and tossed twixt hope and fear, to use Fortunes favour if she fawn upon us? But contrariwise, I account it an assured sign of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodness, and knowing his death at hand, and assured in his conflict, he is not affraid nor dismaid with such apprehensions, but seeketh out with an invincible courage his most assured hazzard.

1 Sam 31. 3, 4. Josephus praiseth Saul for a worthy and valiant King, in that foreknowing his danger and death he exposed himself to allured perill.

This is the praise of our Saul, who is an example to all true lovers of glory, that if they have regard to leave an honest memory to their posterity, they should upon the like opportunity propose the same resolution to themselves: but in especial Kings, who, by reason of the excellency of their degree, ought not onely to forbear to be evil, but also strive to be excellently vertuous. I could likewise say more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but lest I should seem too affectionate, I will return to our former purpose.

1 Sam. 28. 1, ad 5.

After that the Philistines were thus encamped (according as hath been afore spoken) and had numbred their forces according to their Nations, Kingdomes, and Governours, King Achis issued in the Rereward with his particular company, whom David followed, accompanied with his six hundreth souldiers: whom when the Chieftaines of the Philistines beheld, they asked the King whence those Hebrews came, and what their Leaders name was? Who answered them that it was David, who fled from Saul his Master, and how he had entertained him being fled from him: again, how David, in recompense of the good he had received at his hand, and to revenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them against him. But the Chieftains blamed him, because he had chosen an enemy for his associate, counselling him to dismiss him, for fear lest he should secretly perform some strange stratagem against his confederates, because (said they) he hath a fit opportunity to reconcile himself to his Master. They therefore willed him to send David back with his six hundreth souldiers unto the place which he had given him to inhabit, because it was the same David of whom the damosels made songs, singing in praise of him, that he had slain many thousand Philistines. When the King of Geth understood these things, he thought their counsel to be laudable: for which cause, calling David unto him, he said unto him; I protest unto thee (said he) that I bare a most singular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cause I have called thee out to assist us in this battel; but our Captains allow not of this resolution; for which cause, retire thy self to the place which I have given thee, without conceiving any evil suspicion of me. There shalt thou be in garrison, to forestale the enemy from farraging our countrey: and in so doing, thou shalt partly assist me in the war. Hereupon, David departed unto Siceleg, according as the King had commanded him.

29. 10, 11. Achis dismisseth David.

But

A But during the time that David was in camp, and attended on the Philiſtines warre, the Amalechites aroſe and took Siceleg by force, and burned the City: and after they had gathered a great booty both in that place, and in other villages of the Paleſtines Countrey, they retired back again. Now when David arrived at Siceleg, and found it wholly and ruinately ſpoiled, and ſeeing likewiſe that his two wives, and the wives of his companions were priſoners together with their children: he preſently rent his rayment, and began to weep and lament with his companions; yea, ſo much was he afflicted, that he had ſcarce any tears left him to bemoan himſelf: beſide this, his companions amated with the captivity of their wives and children, were ready to ſtone him to death; accuſing him that he was the cauſe of all that which had hapned. But when as his grief was after a manner aſſaked, and he ſomewhat returned to himſelf, he lifted up his heart unto God, and commanded the High B Prieſt Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and ask counſell of God; and that done, to declare unto him whereby by his aſſiſtance he might overtake the Amalekites, if ſo be he ſhould purſue them; and whether he ſhould recover his wives and children that they had led away, and revenge him of his enemies. As ſoon as the High Prieſt had certified him that he might purſue them, he ſallied out with ſix hundreth ſouldiers, and purſued the enemy: and drawing near unto the river, he found a certain ſtragler an Egyptian by nation, wholly diſcomforted and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was preſſed, having for three daies ſpace wandered in the deſart without any ſuſtenance; whom after he had refreſhed with meat and drink, and recomforted, he asked him to whom he belonged, and what he was? The Egyption told his nation; and how he had been left in that place by his maſter, becauſe that through C his weakneſſe it was impoſſible for him to follow them. He confeſſed likewiſe, that his maſter was one of the number of thoſe that had burned and ſacked, not onely other quarters of Judea, but Siceleg alſo. David taking this man for his guide, overtook them, finding ſome of them lying on the earth; others banquetting and following drunkenneſſe, and almoſt ſenſeleſſe by overdrinking: ſo recovering both his booty and pillage, he ſuddenly ſet upon them, and made a great ſlaughter. For they being naked, and ſuſpecting no ſuch inconvenience, and wholly addicted to frolick drinking and feaſting, were all of them eaſily defeated: divers likewiſe amongſt them were ſlain as they ſate at their meat; others likewiſe were ſlaughtered whileſt they carouſed the one unto the other: and ſome of them periſhed being loaden with ſleep, and gorged with wine.

They likewiſe that were compleatly armed, intending to make reſiſtance, were as eaſily D ſlain, as they that lay naked upon the earth: Thus Davids men abode with him from the firſt hour of the morning untill the evening, doing nought elſe but kill and murther, ſo that onely four hundreth of the Amalekites eſcaped, who likewiſe fled being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recovered he all that which the enemy had ranſackt; and amongſt other things he releaſed both his own wives and thoſe of his companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundreth, which might not follow them, becauſe they were appointed to guard the baggage: To theſe, the abovetaid four hundreth would not grant a part of the booty and profit, becauſe they had not (as they ſaid) followed the enemy with them, but ſhewed themſelves ſlack in the purſuit; alledging that they ought to content themſelves with the recovery of their wives. But David ſaid, that the E ſentence which was pronounced by them, was both evil and unjuſt: for ſince God had granted them the grace to defeat their enemies, all of them merited to have part in the profit, which ought equally to be divided amongſt them, both amongſt thoſe that had fought, and amongſt thoſe likewiſe that ſtaied behind to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath been held firmly amongſt them, that they that keep the baggage ſhould have equal part and portion of the prey with thoſe that ſhould go out to the battel. But when David was returned to Siceleg, he ſent unto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Juda, a ſeverall part of the ſpoil: in this manner was Siceleg ſacked and burned, and thus were the Amalechites diſcomfited. But the Philiſtines aſſailed, and fought a bloody F battell with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philiſtines had the upper hand, and ſlew a great number of their enemies. Saul King of Iſrael with his ſonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with ſtout hearts, ſeeing that all their honour conſiſted in that onely point to die nobly, and to hazard themſelves againſt all camiſadoes of their enemies. For ſince the Philiſtines bent all their forces againſt them, they ſaw no means of recovery, ſo that incompaſſed by them, they died in the middeſt of them, and yet before their death, ſlew a great number of the Philiſtines. There were there preſent Sauls three ſonnes; Jonathan, Aminadab and Melchi: who being defeated, all the Hebrew armie turned their backs: ſo that being inſtantly purſued by the enemy, there fell a great diſorder, ſlaughter and confuſion amongſt them.

Saul fled alſo although he had about him a ſtrong ſquadron of men. And although the Philiſtines marſhalled forth againſt him a multitude of archers, that ſhot many darts and arrowes at him; yet were they all but a very few repulſed: and although he had fought very bravely, having received on him divers wounds, yet being unable to ſupport the pain and grief of his wounds, and travelled with ſhortneſſe of breath, he commanded his Eſquire to draw his ſword, and to thruſt it thorow his body before he ſhould be ſurprized alive by his enemies: which his Eſquire refuſed to do, not daring to lay hands upon his Maſter. For which cauſe Saul drew his own ſword, and ſettled the point to his breſt and caſt himſelf thereon: but unable to force it home enough, nor make it by goaring himſelf thereon to pierce quite thorow him, he looked back and perceived a young man hard behind him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, he requeſted him, that ſince himſelf was unable to pierce himſelf with his own hands, that he would lean upon him, and make the ſword paſſe thorow him, and bring him to that death which he ſo earneſtly deſired: which he did, and having taken from him the gold which he had about his armes, and the Royall Crown likewiſe, he fled away. The Eſquire ſeeing Saul dead, ſuddenly ſlew himſelf: Not one of all the Kings Guard eſcaped, but all of them were ſlain near unto the mountain Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other ſide of Jordan and in the Plain, had intelligence that Saul and his ſonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their Nation was ſlain, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defenced. The Philiſtines finding theſe Cities deſtitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whileſt the Philiſtines ſpoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his ſonnes, which they ſpoiled and beheaded; ſending their heads round about the Countrey,, to make it known that their enemies were defeated. They offered up their armes alſo in the temple of Aſtaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the walls of the city of Bethſan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Jabes a City of Galaad underſtood how the Philiſtines had thus cut off the heads of Saul and his ſonnes, they were ſore moved, and thought it became them not to be ſo careleſſe of them, but that they ſhould be reſcued. For which cauſe the moſt valiant and hardy amongſt them (for that City bringeth up men both valiant in heart and ſtrong in body) departed and marched all night long, ſo that they attained Bethſan, and approaching near the walls, took down the bodies of Saul and his ſonnes, and carried them unto Jabes, without any reſiſtance of the enemy, in that they durſt not attempt the reſcue. Theſe Jabeſians lamented over their dead bodies, and made publick lamentations, and buried them in the faireſt place of their Countrey, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this manner weeping, both men, and women and children, and beating their breſts, and lamenting the King and his ſonnes, and taſting neither meat nor drink. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, becauſe he had diſobeyed God in his warre againſt the Amalechites, and for that he had ſlain the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himſelf alſo, and deſtroyed the City of the Prieſts. He raigned during the life of Samuel, for the ſpace of eighteen yeers, and twenty two years after his death. Thus finiſhed Saul his life.

THis battel was fought on the same day that David returned conquerour to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three dayes after his return, he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battel, having his garment rent, and cast ashes upon his head, came and cast himself prostrate before David: & being demanded from whence he came, he answered, from the battel of the Israelites; and certified David of the unhappy issue thereof: telling him how divers thousands of the Hebrews were slain, and how Saul himself and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. He likewise E gave him to understand, how he himself retreated amongst the Hebrews, and was present at the flight of the King: confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, under purpose to redeem him from the hands of his enemie: For (said he) Saul having cast himself upon the point of his sword, was so weak, by reason of the agony of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himself. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death; the gold about his arms, and the royal Crown which he took and brought from him being dead. David perceiving no cause whereby he should suspect his death, whereof he had most evident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions: and the more was he overpressed with sorrow, by reason of F the loss of his most dear friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and conserver of his life: And so vertuous and affectionate shewed he himself towards Saul, that although he had often times been in danger to have been slain by him, yet was he sore agrieved at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himself had accused himself for slaying the King, declaring thereby that he was the son of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should be put to death. He composed likewise Lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Jonathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I live. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his Lamentations and Obsequies, he asked counsel of God by the means of the Prophet, what Citie of the tribe of Juda he would give him to inhabit in? who answered him that he would give him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his wife and ſouldiers. All the people of the foreſaid tribe reſorted thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where underſtanding how the Jabeſins had buried Saul and his ſons, he ſent Embaſſadors unto them, both to praiſe and approve their actions, promiſing them that both he allowed their act, and would remunerate their devoir which they had extended toward the dead: giving them likewiſe to underſtand that the tribe of Juda had choſen him for their King. But Abner the ſon of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble diſpoſition, underſtanding that Saul and Jonathan, and his two other brothers were dead, came into the camp, and bringing with him the onely ſon of Saul that was left, whoſe name was Iſboſeth, he paſſed on the other ſide of Jordan, and proclaimed him King of all the people except the tribe of Juda. He appointed likewiſe for his royal ſeat and place of reſidence, a certain countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the camp. From thence went he with an elected band of ſouldiers, with a reſolution to fight againſt thoſe of the tribe of Juda, in that he was diſpleaſed with them, becauſe they had made choiſe of David for their King. Againſt him marched out Joab the ſon of Suri and of Sarvia, Davids ſiſter, General of his army, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abiſai and Azael, and all Davids ſouldiers: and arriving near a certain fountain of Gabaa, he arranged his army in that place to enter battel. And when as Abner ſaid unto him, that he deſired to make trial whether part had the better ſouldiers, it was accorded between them, that twelve of either ſide ſhould be choſen out to determine the challenge: who marched out into a certain place betwixt both the hoaſts, and having darted their Javelins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to the ſword; where mutually aſſailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, ſides and bowels, they all of them at laſt fell down dead, as if the plot had been determined between them. Which done, the two armies joyned in like ſort, and after a cruel battel Abner with his followers were diſcomfited: who ſpeedily flying were inceſſantly purſued by Joab, who in his own perſon inſiſted and exhorted his other ſouldiers to purſue them haſtily, without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Ioabs brothers were hot upon the chaſe, and the youngeſt of them called Azael, gave ſpeciall teſtimony of his forwardneſs, through that ſwiftneſs in running wherewith he was endowed, for he ran not onely more ſwift then other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whileſt thus he purſued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong courſe, without turning either on the one ſide or on the other; Abner turned back upon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces; he firſt covenanted with him for one ſouldiers armour, and another time ſeeing that he could not be perſwaded to ſtay, he prayed him to arreſt himſelf and purſue him no further, for fear leſt being inforced to kill him, he ſhould be deprived of the courage to behold his brother Joab. But perceiving that he made no account of his words, in that Azael inſtantly inſiſted to purſue him; Abner flying and turning himſelf back, ſtrook him with a Javelin which he had in his hand; in ſuch ſort as he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewiſe arriving in the place where Azaels body unadventurouſly fell dead, ſtaied round about him, and ſurceaſed to purſue the enemy any further. But Joab and his brother Abiſai outſtripping the body with ſwift running, and conceiving a more mortal hate againſt Abner, for that he had in this ſort ſlain their brother, they purſued him untill ſun-ſet, with admirable ſwiftneſſe, and incredible alacritie, unto a place called Dumaton: There mounting upon a hillock, he ſaw Abner with the Tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him and ſay, that men of the ſame tribe ſhould not be ſo whetted and incenſed the one againſt the other: That their brother Azael was in the fault, becauſe that although he had exhorted him to ceaſe from running after him, yet could he not perſwade him, and that for the ſame cauſe he had both ſtrucken and ſlain him. Joab wiſely digeſting theſe his ſayings, and accepting of them as of wholeſome and friendly advertiſements and counſels, he commanded the trumpet to ſound a retreat, and ſurceaſed to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and having paſt over Jorden, returned to his camp to Isboſeth, Sauls ſon. The next day Joab ſurveyed the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide, were about three hundred and ſixty men; and on Davids ſide nineteen, over and beſides Azael, whoſe body Joab and Abiſai took with them, and carried it to Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the tomb of their anceſtors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there aroſe a civil warre amongſt the Hebrews, and endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwayes the upper-hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without returning with ſome advantage,

How many on each ſide died in the battel.

2 Sam. 3. 1, 2. The beginning of civil war amongſt the Hebrews.

A advantage; whereas the ſon of Saul and his partakers had almoſt every day the worſe. David at that time had ſix ſons by ſo many wives, the eldeſt of them was called Ammon, the ſonne of Achimaas, the ſecond was Daniel the ſonne of Abigal, the third was called Abſalon the ſonne of Machama the daughter of Ptolemey King of Geſſur; the fourth was Adonias the ſonne of his wife called Aggite: the fifth and the ſixth were called Gertheſſa and Gala. But after this civil warre was begun, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountered and fought together; Abner Generall of the army of King Sauls ſonne, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavoured all that in him lay, that the whole Countrey might be commanded by Iſboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted unto him for a certain time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accuſed to have kept
B company with Riſpa, Sauls Concubine, the daughter of Sibath, and that Iſboſeth likewiſe had reproved him for the ſame cauſe, he conceived a great grief and deſpight, ſuppoſing that he had great injury done unto him, conſidering how careful he had been, and was of the Kings eſtate: for which cauſe he threatned him to eſtabliſh the Kingdome of David, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him ſoveraigne over the tribes on that ſide Jordan, but that his faith & warlike conduct was the cauſe thereof. For which cauſe he ſent unto Hebron to David. requiring him by an oath to except of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſwade the people to forſake Sauls ſonne, and to proclaim him King of the whole region: David ſware unto him, according as he had required, and was very glad of that Embaſſage that Abner had ſent unto him, and the
C rather for that under aſſured teſtimony of their accords, he had preſerved Michol, Davids wife (whom he had purchaſed with the price of divers great dangers, and with ſix hundreth heads of the Philiſtines preſented to his father Saul, to the end he might enjoy her) which Michol, Abner had ſent him back, having taken her from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſboſeth alſo was aſſiſtant, to whom David had written that it was reaſon that he ſhould recover his wife. Abner therefore aſſembled all the elders and Governours of the people, and told them that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſboſheth, and to ſubmit themſelves to David, he had diſſwaded them from that intent; but at this preſent if they had the will, he would condeſcend unto them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen David (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to be King over all
D the Hebrews; and had foretold that he ſhould puniſh the Philiſtines, and ſhould overcome them, and bring them under his ſubjection. Which when the elders and Governours underſtood, and were aſſured likewiſe that Abner would ſubſcribe to their reſolution as touching the eſtate, they all of them determined to ſubmit themſelves to David. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolved, did afterwards aſſemble all the tribe of Benjamin (out of which the archers of Iſboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiving that they contradicted him no waies, but ſubmitted themſelves unto his pleaſure, he gathered about twenty of his familiar friends, and reſorted unto David to receive in his own perſon Davids oath: both for that each man in his own affairs repoſeth greateſt confidence in himſelfe, as alſo to give him intelligence what ſpeech he had held with the elders and the whole tribe. David received
E and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently and ſumptuouſly feaſted him at his table for many dayes, praying him that he would depart, and return & bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence and ſight, he might deliver him up the government. When David had diſmiſſed Abner; ſome little time after his departure, Ioab the Generall of Davids armie came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had been with David, & that but ſome little time before he was departed from him, with accords and promiſes made unto him that he ſhould be Governour; he fearing leſt that if David ſhould place him in honour and dignitie, and ſhould make Abner (who was a man otherwiſe exerciſed in affairs, & politique to prevent occaſions) as it were his companion in the Kingdome, that the ſaid Ioab ſhould be degraded and deprived of his office; he took upon him a curſed and froward reſolution. For firſt of all F he laboured to detract and make him odious in the Kings eare, counſelling him to ſtand on his guard, and not to give eare unto Abners promiſes, who under colour and ſubtilty ſought to eſtabliſh the Kingdome unto Sauls ſon: alledging that he came unto him under colour and cautele, intending then to leave him, when his hopes were ſatisfied and affairs diſpoſed: But perceiving that theſe his ſubtilities took little effect with David, and conſidering with himſelfe likewiſe that he mooved him in no ſort, he attempted a more perilous exploit then the former. For reſolving with himſelfe to kill Abner, he ſent out certain men after him, whom he gave in commiſſion that as ſoon as they ſhould overtake him, they ſhould urge their interparley in the name of David, alledging that they had ſomething to communicate with him as touching the eſtate, which he had forgot to certifie him of.

v. 29.

When Abner had heard the words of theſe meſſengers (who overtook him in a place called Beſira, ſome twenty furlongs off of Hebron) he ſtrook out of the way without ſuſpicion of his future dyſaſter, and Ioab going before him, embraced him, with great love, and like an affectionate friend (for ſuch as enterprize any wicked action, do often and ſubtilly diſſemble and make ſhew of honeſtie, to the end to expell out of the innocents minde all jealouſie or evill ſuſpition) where ſingling him from his other company, and making ſhew to informe him of certaine ſecrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beſide the wall, accompanied onely with his brother Abiſai, he drew his rapier and thruſt it into his ſhort ribs: Of which wound Abner died, ſurprized by the treaſon of Ioab; who pretented and coloured that act of his, with the revenge and death of his brother Azael, whom Abner had ſlain upon the chaſe in the firſt war at Hebron; but in truth it was but the ſuſpicion of his greatneſſe and honour, fearing leſt he ſhould be deprived, and Abner inſeated by obtaining the next degree of honour unto David. Hereby may a man conceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition ſake, and to the end they may not be inferiour unto any others in thoſe matters. For when as they deſire to attaine riches and honors, they atchieve it by ten thouſand miſchiefes; and at ſuch time as they feare to be diſpoſſeſt, they ſtrive to continue their eſtates by means more pernicious, becauſe they think it to be the leſſe ſinne, and that the calamity is leſſe active, rather not to have obtained to any greatneſſe and power, then after the poſſeſſion thereof, to fall into diſgrace. Thence it cometh, that all of them intend and practiſe many hazards and difficult encountries, through the fear they have to loſe their degree. But it ſufficeth to have briefly touched his point. David having notice of the murther of Abner, conceived a great griefe in his heart, and called all his aſſiſtants to witneſſe, lifting up his hands unto God, and proteſting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had been ſlain without his commandement or will. He likewiſe uttered moſt grievous curſes againſt the murtherer, his houſe and accomplices, by which he wiſhed them to be ſubject to the fatall penaltie of murther: for he greatly ſuſpected leſt he ſhould be held in ſuſpicion to be a party in that which had hapned unto Abner, contrary to his faith, oath and promiſe, which he had paſt unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people ſhould weepe and lament for him, and that the funerals of his body ſhould be honoured according to the accuſtomed faſhion, in renting of garments and putting on ſackcloth: and that the ſame ſhould be done, the coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefeſt Governours of the Iſraelites followed, beating on their breaſts, and ſhedding tears, and teſtifying the love which they bare unto him during his life, and their diſpleaſure to ſee him dead, who had been murthered contrary to their will and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs compoſed in his praiſe by David himſelfe, who ſetting himſelfe on the tombe firſt of all lamented, and gave others cauſe of lamentation. And ſo much was he confuſed at the death of this Abner, that he ſwore to forbeare all kinde of meat untill the ſunne-ſet, notwithſtanding all the inſtances of his friends, who urged him to take refection: which act of his purchaſed him much good will and love amongſt the people. For they that loved Abner, were very glad to be witneſſes of that honour which he did him in his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, every way according to the cuſtome, as if he had been his kinſman or friend, and not embaſing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if he had been his enemie. And in generall, all of them were ſo glad of the courteſie, ſweetneſſe and royall nature of King David, that they eſteemed in like caſe, that he would have the like eſtimate of them, as they ſaw him have of deceaſed Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increaſed the peoples good opinion of him, eſcaping thereby the ſuſpicion and conceit that he might in ſome ſort have been acceſſary to his death. He proteſted alſo unto the people, that he conceived no ſmall griefe at the loſſe of ſo good a man, declaring thereby that it was no ſmall ſtaine unto the ſtate of the Hebrews to be deprived of him, who had the means to maintaine their peace by his good adviſe, and to ratifie the ſame by his executions and warlike valour: But God (ſaid he) who hath care of all things, ſhall not ſuffer him to die unrevenged: And he it is that ſhall beare me witneſſe, that it lyeth not in my power to puniſh Ioab and Abiſai, who have greater credit in the armie then my ſelfe; yet ſhall they not eſcape Gods juſtice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

CHAP. II.

The year of the world, 2979. before Christs nativity, 1065.

Isboseth is slain through the treason of his friends and followers: the whole Kingdom descendeth to David.

WHen Isboseth Sauls son, had notice of Abners death, he was sore displeased, not onely for that he perceived himself to be deprived of his neer kinsman, ,but also of so great a personage as had setled the Crown on his head. Neither did he himself long time remain alive after him: but by the sons of Jeremon, Banaoth and Thannus, he was traiterously done to death. These two being Benjamites, and of the chiefest nobilitie amongst them, made their reckoning that they would make away Ibsoseth, and thereby obtain great recompence at Davids hands; supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefest place and dignitie in the army, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isboseth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed & asleep, and unassisted by any of his guard, and perceiving likewise that the Porter was fast, who through his travel and other business (by reason of the extream heat) was laid down to rest: they entred into his lodging whereas Isboseth was asleep, and slew him: and having cut off his head, they travelled all the night and day long, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure them from perill. And when they came to Hebron, they presented David with Isboseths head, offering themselves as his most dutifull liegemen to do him service, who had delivered him of an enemy, and made away an adversary against his royalty. But David allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus unto them; O cursed men said he, (on whom I intend presently to execute justice) have you not heard how I punished him that murthered Saul, and brought his royall crown unto me? Yea, although he slew him upon his own instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprize him alive.

2. 5. ad 12. Isboseths head is brought to David.

Davids sharp invective against the murtherers of Isboseth, and their punishments.

Were you of that opinion that I was changed, and that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your mischiefs, or that I will countenance them, as if these acts of yours (who are murtherers of your Master) were laudable in you? In you I say, who have slain a good man on his bed, that injured no man, but was your benefactour, and who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure your selves, that ye shall be punished in his behalf, and shall yield me satisfaction by the loss of your lives, because ye have thought that Isboseths death would work my contentment: for you could not in any sort dishonour me more, then by conceiving such an opinion of me. Which said, he adjudged them to die by the most cruel torments that might be imagined: and with all the honour that he might, he caused Isboseths head to be interred in Abners Tombe.

These murtherers being thus done to death, all the chiefest of the people repaired to David unto Hebron (both they that commanded over thousands, and such also as were Governours) and submitted themselves unto him, reckoning up the good affection they had born him, both during Sauls life-time, as also the honour which they had never discontinued to bear him, since the first time that he was Coronel over a thousand, especially for that he had been chosen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and his children after him; declaring unto him that God had given him the Countrey of the Hebrews, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. David accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should never repent themselves of their obedience: and after he had banquetted and entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

David entertained the nobles kindly.

Of the Tribe of Juda, there came together about six thousand eight hundred men of war, bearing for their arms a buckler and a javelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sons, and besides whom the Tribe of Juda had assigned the kingdom to David. Of the Tribe of Simeon, seven thousand, and a hundred or somewhat more: of that of Levi 4700. whose chieftain was Jodam, with whom was Sadoc the high Priest, accompanied with twentie and two Governours of the same linage. Of the Tribe of Benjamin four thousand men of warre: for this Tribe were as yet of that opinion that some of the heirs of Saul should raign. Of that of Ephraim 20800. both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the half as many, namely eight thousand. Of that of Issachar two hundred who were skilfull in divination, and 20000. men of warre. Of that of Zabulon 20000. chosen fighting men: for only this intire Tribe was wholly at Davids command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the tribe of Nepthali there were a thousand chieftains, famous for their valour, and armed with shield and javelin, attended by an infinite number of their Tribe. Of the Tribe of Dan there were 27000. choſen men. Of that of Aſer 40000. Of the two Tribes on the other ſide of Jordan, and of the half Tribe of Manaſſes ſix ſcore thouſand armed men, with bucler, javelin, murrion and ſword: The reſt of the other Tribes alſo wore ſwords. All this multitude was aſſembled together in Hebron before David, with great proviſion of victuals and wine, ſufficient to ſuſtein them all, who all of them with one conſent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had muſtred, and banquetted for three dayes ſpace in Hebron, David diſlodged from thence with his whole hoſt, and repaired to Jeruſalem. But the Jebuſites, who at that time inhabited the Citie, and were of the race of the Canaanites, ſhutting up their gates againſt his coming, and placing on their walls as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other ſort, in contempt of him, ſcoffingly jeſted and ſaid, that theſe were ſufficient to keep out the enemy: ſo much truſted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being ſore diſpleaſed, began to beſiege Jeruſalem, and uſing all diligence and induſtry to ſurprize the ſame, he incontinently expreſſed how ſtrong he was, checking thereby other mens pride, who perhaps would have done the like unto him, and afterwards took the lower Town. And for that the higher Town was as yet unſurprized, the King reſolved to encourage his men of warre to ſhew themſelves valiant, promiſing them honours and recompence; proclaiming that he would make him Generall over all the people, that ſhould firſt of all ſcale, aſcend and ſeize the wall. Whileſt thus they enforced themſelves to mount without refuſing any travel (through the deſire they had to obtain the government that was promiſed) Joab the ſon of Servia, was the forwardeſt amongſt the reſt; and having got upon the wall, cried unto the King, requiring him to grant him the generall government.

CHAP. III.

David having taken Jeruſalem by force, caſteth out all the Canaanites from thence, and delivereth the City to be inhabited by the Jews.

David expelleth the Jebuſites out of the town and city of Jeruſalem.

After therefore he had caſt out the Jebuſites from the higher Citie, and repaired Jeruſalem, he called it the City of David, and remained therein all the time of his raign: ſo that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, over the ſole Tribe of Juda, was ſeven years, and ſix moneths. But after he had eſtabliſhed Jeruſalem for his royal Citie, his fortunes dayly more and more increaſed, becauſe God both furthered and bettered them. Hiram alſo, King of Tyre, ſent unto him, and made a league of amitie with him: he preſented him likewiſe with preſents of Cedar wood, and workmen and Maſons, to build him a royall houſe in Jeruſalem. Now, when the King had ſeized the higher Citie, he annexed the rock thereunto, and made one body of twain; and having walled it in, he gave the government thereof to Joab. This King was the firſt that drove the Jebuſites out of Jeruſalem, and called the ſame by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there ſome that infer, that Homer under that name intended Jeruſalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue, Solyma is as much to ſay, as Securitie. All the time from the exploit of warre made by Joſuah againſt the Canaanites, and ſince the diviſion of the Countrey (during all which time, the Iſraelites could not drive the Canaanites out of Jeruſalem) untill ſuch time as David took the ſame by force, were five hundred and fifteen yeers. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongſt the Jebuſites; who, for that he was well affected towards the Hebrews, was not put to death in the ſurpriſal which David made of Jeruſalem: but (as I will ſhortly declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the King, David eſpouſed other wives beſides thoſe which he had; beſides many other Concubines: by them he had eleven ſons, whoſe names are theſe which follow, Amnas, Emma, Ebamatha, Solomon, Jebar, Eliel, Phalna, Enuapha, Jenaah, Eliphal: beſides theſe he had, a daughter called Thamar. Nine of theſe were begotten of noble mothers, but the two laſt (which were named by us) were the ſons of Concubines. But Thamar was Abſalons ſiſter by the ſame father and mother.

2 Sam. 5.18. ad finem. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4.

Now, when the Paleſtines knew that the Hebrews had created David King, they led forth their Army againſt him towards Jeruſalem, where, encamping themſelves in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not far off from the Citie) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrews, who was wont to do nothing incon-

A inconsiderately, without Gods advice, commanded the high Priest to prophecie, & foretell, what successe and event the warre should have; who after he had informed him that God smileth on, and favoureth their attempts, he presently drew out his army against the enemy: and striking the battell, he suddenly assailed the enemies on their backs, and partly slew them, and partly put them to flight. But let no man suspect, that the armie of the Palestines was either small in number, or weak in courage, which at that time assailed the Hebrews, in that he conjectureth in his minde, that they were easily overcome; without their attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to know, that all Syria, Phenicia, (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare arms with them, and were confederates in this warre: which was the onely cause, that notwithstanding they were so many

B times overcome, and had lost divers thousands of men, that they desisted not to assail the Hebrews with more great force: and that which is more, having been defeated in the battels before recited, yet forbare they not to assail David anew with thrice as much power as before, and to incamp in the same place. For which cause, David took counsell of God once more, what the issue of this battell should be: and the high Priest told him, that he should encamp in the forrest called Tears, because it was not farre off from the enemies camp, and that he should not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battell, before the trees did shake without any agitation or breath of winde. Whereupon, as soon as the trees shook, and the time which God had appointed was come; without any delay, he issued out, to enjoy a prepared and manifest victorie. For the squadrons of the enemie were desarraied, and incon-

C tinently betook them to flight, and were swiftly followed and slaughtered, untill the citie of Gerar (which is a frontire-town of their countrey) and their camp was thorowly ransacked, wherein there were found great riches; and amongst all other things, their gods were beaten to pieces.

The yeer of the world, 2899. before christs nativitie, 1065.

The Palestines moving warre against David, are partly slain or put to flight.

The Palestines invaded the Hebrews with a mighty army gathered out of sundrie nations.

The Palestines flight.

The battell being brought to this end, it seemed good unto David (by the counsel of the Elders and Coronels over thousands) that all the flower of their youth should be assembled from all the parts of the countrey, every one according to his Tribe. Secondly, that the Priests and Levites should repair to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Ark of God, and convey it to Jerusalem; to the end that when it should be there, the service of God might thereafter be celebrated in that place, and other sacrifices and honours, agreeable to

D the divine Majesty, might be performed. And had the same been done during the life of Saul, no inconvenience had fallen upon them. When as all the people were assembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transferre the Ark; which the Priests carrying out of Aminidabs house, they laid it upon a new Wain, which (together with oxen) their brothers and children drew.

2 Sam. 6. 1. ad 5. Davids command as touching the transportation of the Ark.

The King marched formost, and after him all his people, praising God, and tuning all sorts of melodie then usuall in that countrey, with diversitie of sounds of instruments, of Dances, and Shalms, Trumpets and Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Ark into Jerusalem. But when they were come to the threshing floore of Chidon (which is a certain place so called) Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the oxen stumbling that drew the

E Chariot, and the Ark somewhat shaken, he stretched out his hand with intent to sustain the same; and because he was no Priest, God strook him till he died. The King and the people were sore aggrieved at the death of Oza, and the place where he died, is called to this day, Ozas-Striking. David, fearing lest if he should retire the Ark with him into the Citie, the like hap should attend him that had befallen Oza, (who was in that sort done to death, for that he had onely thus stretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his own house within the citie, but commanded that it should be left in the possession of one called Obed, by descent a Levite, and in behaviour, a man good and vertuous: where it remained for three moneths space, during which time, his house was blessed with all worldly goods and

F goodnesse. The king being ascertained what advantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore and needy man, was suddenly become very rich, so that all men had their eyes fixed on him, and they that heard speak of his house, envied him) he assured himself that no inconvenience would befall him; for which cause he retired the Ark into his own house, which was carried by the Priests; and seven quires of singing men, disposed by the King, went before the same. The King himself likewise touched, and played upon the Harp, so that Michol, Davids wife and Sauls daughter, seeing him entertaining himself after that manner, mocked at him. The Ark then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dressed by David, who offered most magnificent sacrifices of all sorts, and forgot not the sacrifices for prosperities: he feasted all the people likewise, both men, women, and children, distributing unto every one a cake, a morsell of rosted meat, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the sacrifice:

sacrifice: and after he had thus feasted the people, he dismissed them, and retraited himself into his own house. But Michol his wife and daughter to King Saul, drawing neer unto him upon his return, besought God for him, that it might please him in all other things she might expresse unto her husband all that, which became her intire and unequald love towards him: but in this she blamed him, because that being so great and mighty a King as he was, he had dishonoured himself in dancing, despoiling himself, and discovering partly that which became him not, doing all this in company of his servants and handmaids. To whom David answered, that he was not ashamed in performing a thing so acceptable unto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him above all others, assuring her that he would play and dance oftentimes after that sort, without care whether his demeanor pleased either her or her chambermaids. This Michol (of whom we entreat) had no children by David, but being married again to another (to whom her father had betrothed her after he had ravished her from David) she bare five sonnes, of whom we will speak in their place. The King perceiving how by Gods assistance his affairs prospered daily more and more, thought that it should be a hainous offence in him, if he should dwell in houses made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Ark, suffer it to remain under a pavillion: for which cause he conceived a desire to build a Temple unto God, according as Moses had foretold: and to this intent consulted he with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to perform all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be each way assistant unto him: for which cause he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple. But the same night God appeared unto Nathan, commanding him to certifie David, that he accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable unto him (considering in especiall that no one before him had a thought to perform the like) yet notwithstanding (although his deliberation were such) he permitted him not to finish the same, by reason he had followed many warres, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his decease) which shall happen after he hath lived a long and prosperous life) his sonne called Solomon (to whom he shall leave the kingdome after his death) shall cause a Temple to be built unto him, promising him to assist and favour the said Solomon (even as the father doth his sonne) and that he would continue the Royalty in his heirs and their successours: And that if they shall happen to offend him, he will onely punish them with sickness and sterilitie. David understanding these words which were delivered him by the Prophet, was very joyfull, by reason that the Royalty was firmly assured to his heirs, and for that his house should be famous and renowned; and presenting himself before the Ark, he prostrated himself and adored, and gave God thanks for all the benefits he had bestowed on him; for that from a poor and humble shepherd, he had raised him to so great a height of majestie and glorie, and for that he had promised to have care of his posteritie as erst he had had of the Hebrews and their libertie. This said, after he had sung hymnes unto God, he departed.

NOt long time after this, David thought it requisite to make warre upon the Philistines, partly, to the intent he might avoid the suspition of sloth and idlenesse, and partly, that having (according as God had foretold) discomfited his enemies, he might leave a peaceable Kingdome to his posteritie after him. He therefore assembled his armie anew, commanding them to be in a readinesse to march forward to the warre: when as therefore he supposed that the Armie was addressed, he departed out of Jerusalem, and made a road upon the Philistines, whom he overcame in battell, and took a great part of the countrey from them, by means whereof he enlarged the frontiers of the Hebrews, and translated the warre, and led forth his forces against the Moabites: whose armie being divided into two parts, was by him defeated and overthrown, and the rest were taken prisoners, and tributes were imposed on them, which they were bound to satisfie every yeer. Afterwards he led out his host against Adarezer sonne of Ara, King of Sophona: and waging battell with him neer unto the river of Euphrates, he slew about twentie thousand of his footmen, and some five thousand of his horse: he took also almost a thousand of chariots; the greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them onely reserved to his own use.

They of Damaſco are overcome by David.

The year of the world, 2964. before Chriſts Nativity, 1064.

ADad King of Damaſco and of Syria, underſtanding that David had made warre on Adarezer (who was both his friend and confederate) iſſued forth with great forces to be aſſiſtant unto him, and to deliver him from his enemies according as he expected. But entring the field, and waging battell with David neer unto the river of Euphrates, he was overcome and loſt a great number of his ſouldiers: for in that battel there was ſlain on his ſide by the Hebrew enemy, to the number of twenty thouſand, and the reſt fled. Of this King, Nicholas the Hiſtoriographer maketh mention in the fourth Book of his hiſtories, in theſe words: Sithence and long time after, a certain man of that Countrey called Adad governed in Damaſco, and over the reſt of Syria (except Phœnicia) who making warre againſt David King of Judea, and having oftentimes fought with him, in his laſt encounter (wherein he was overcome near unto the flood Euphrates) he ſhewed himſelf more reſolute then all other Kings in force and valour. Moreover he ſpeaketh of his heirs, how after his death, they ſucceeded him both in royalty and name, the one after the other, and ſaith thus: He being deceaſed, his ſonnes raigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiving from their father, the ſame name and the ſame Kingdome, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Egypt. The third of theſe being more mighty then the reſt, and deſirous to revenge himſelf in warre of theſe injuries, which were offered unto his grandfather, led forth his army againſt the Jews, and deſtroyed the countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any waies from the truth: for he of whom he ſpeaketh, is that Adad, that made warre in Samaria, during the reign of Achab king of Iſrael, of whom we will ſpeak hereafter in this place. But when David had led forth his camp againſt Damaſco, and againſt the reſt of the Countrey of Syria, he reduced them all under his obeiſance, placing garriſons amidſt their Countrey, and impoſing tribute upon them, which they ſhould pay unto him. He dedicated alſo to God in the city of Jeruſalem, the golden quivers and armors which Adads guard were wont to wear; which afterward Syſſac king of Ægypt took at ſuch time as he warred againſt Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the Temple of Jeruſalem, as it ſhall be declared hereafter, when as we ſhall come to intreat of that matter. This king of the Hebrews being inſpired by God (who made him proſperous in all his warres) encamped before the goodlieſt cities Adarezer had, that is to ſay, Betthea and Macon, which he beſieged, took, and ſpoiled: where there was found great ſtore of gold and ſilver and of braſſe, which was of more eſtimation then gold, whereof Solomon made that great veſſel called the ſea, and other fair lavers, at ſuch time as he adorned and furniſhed the Temple of God. When the King of Amath underſtood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were deſtroyed, he grew afraid of his own eſtate, and reſolved with himſelf to make a league and confederacie with David, before he might come out againſt him: and to that intent he ſent his ſonne Adoram unto him, to teſtifie and expreſſe that contentment he had received, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemy, and to contract with him amity and confederation. He ſent him preſents alſo, namely, veſſels of antique work of Gold, of Silver, and of Braſſe: whereupon David made a league with Thani, (for ſo was the king of Amath called) and received the preſents that were ſent unto him; and afterwards diſmiſſed his ſonne with convenient honour, both for the one and the other: and conſecrated that to God which he had ſent him (together with the gold and ſilver, which he had taken from other cities and nations that were ſubject unto him.) For God did not onely ſo farre favour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own warres; but having alſo ſent Abiſai Joabs brother the Lieutenant of his Army againſt the Idumeans, he likewiſe granted him victory: for Abiſai ſlew in the battel about eighteen thouſand of them, and filled all Idumea with garriſons, challenging a tribute throughout the Countrey by the pole. This king loved juſtice of his own nature, and exerciſed judgment according to verity. He had for his Lieutenant generall in all his Armies Joab, and appointed Joſaphat the ſonne of Achilles chief over the Regiſters. After Abiather, he eſtabliſhed Sadock of the houſe of Phinees for High Prieſt, who was his friend. Siſa was his Secretary, Banaia the ſonne of Ioiada was Captain over his guard, and all the Elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembring himſelf alſo of the conventions and oaths that were paſt 'twixt him and Jonathan the ſonne of Saul, and of the amity and affection that had been between them (for beſides all other graces which he had, he moſt freſhly retained them in memory, from whom in times paſt he had received any friendſhip. cause a search to be made, if any one of the house and family of Jonathan were left alive, to G
the intent he might remunerate the friendship which he had received at Jonathans hands.
Whereupon a certain man was brought unto him (who was enfranchised by Saul) that might enform him what one of his race was alive: who asked him if he could name him any of Jonathans sonnes then living, whom he might make partaker of those courteous favours and graces, which in times past he had received by Jonathan? Who answered him, that he had one sonne remaining, whose name was Mephibosheth, who was lame of his legges; for that at such time as the news came that both his father and grandfather were slain in the battell, his nurse fearfully snatching up the child and flying, suffered him unfortunately to fall from her shoulders, and so hurt him. When as then he was advertised where, and with whom he was H brought up, he sent unto the City of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephibosheth was kept, and commanded him to be brought unto him. Now when he came to Davids presence, he cast himself prostrate on his face to do him reverence; but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gave him his fathers house with all the possessions that were purchased by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to sit and feed with him at his own table: yea, to eat of his royal provision, not letting one day slip wherein he accompanied him not at meals. The young man did him reverence, humbly thanking him for the gracious words, and royall offers he had made unto him. At that time David called for Siba, and certified him how he had given Mephibosheth his fathers house and all Sauls purchases, commanding him to manure and husband his possessions, and to have care of all I things, and to return the revenue to Jerusalem, for that Mephibosheth was every day to take his refection at his table, charging both him and his fifteen sonnes, and twenty servants, to do him service. After the King had thus disposed of him, Siba did him reverence, and after he had protested to perform whatsoever he had given him in charge, he departed, and Jonathans sonne remained in Jerusalem, where he lived at the Kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had been his own sonne: he had a sonne also called Micha.

These were the honours that those children which survived after Jonathan and Sauls death, received at Davids hands. About the same day died Naas King of the Ammonites, who during his life time was Davids friend, and his sonne succeeded him in his Kingdome, to whom David sent Ambassadors to comfort him, exhorting him to digest his fathers death K with patience, assuring him that he would expresse no lesse love towards him, then he did unto his father. But the Governours of the Ammonites entertained this Ambassage very contumeliously, and not according as David had kindly intended it, and murmured against their King, telling him that they were but spies sent by David to seek into his forces, and discover the strength of his countrey, under a pretext of humanity, counselling him to stand upon his guard, and not to give ear to his protestation, lest being deceived, he should fall into some remediless inconvenience.

v. 5, 6. David is sore displeased with the injuries offered to his Ambassadours, intending revenge. The Ammonites hire their confederates, and prepare for the warre against David.

Naas King of the Ammonites, supposing that his governours spake nothing but truth, outraged the Ambassadors that were sent unto him with great injuries: for causing the half of their beards to be shaven close by the chin, and cutting away the half of their vestments, he L sent them back again, returning their answers not in words, but in deeds. Which when David saw, he was grievously displeaded, and made it known that he would not suffer that mockery and injury so easily to be digested, but that he would make warre on the Ammonites, and revenge those indignities that were offered to his Ambassadors. The friends and governours of Naas considering how they had violated and broken the peace, and how for that occasion they deserved to be punished; prepared for that warre, and sent a thousand talents to Syrus King of Mesopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that warre, and receive their pay: they requested the like of Subas: these Kings had 20000. footmen in camp.
They hired also with their money the King of the countrey called Michas, and the fourth called Istob, which two had with them twelve thousand souldiers. M

CHAP. VII.

How David overcame the Mesopotamians.

v. 7, 8. David sendeth out Joab with the choisest flower of his army against the Ammonites.

BUt David was nothing amated, neither with the confederacy, nor force of the Ammonites; but trusting in God, resolved that the cause of his warre was just: for which cause he continued in revenge of those outrages which he had received by them. Having therefore mustered under Joab the flower of his whole Army, he commanded him to depart and make warre upon them: who came and incamped himself before their chiefest City called Aramath; which when the enemies perceived,

A perceived, they iſſued forth and arranged themſelves in battell, not altogether, but in two ſeveral parts. For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plain, and the Ammonites ſtood in battell array near unto their City gate, to make head againſt the Hebrews. Joab perceiving this, uſed this ſtratageme to countervail their complot: for he choſe out the ableſt and ſtouteſt of his men to ſerve under him againſt Syrus, and the other Kings confederates with him, and gave the reſt to his brother Abiſai, commanding him to oppoſe himſelf againſt the Ammonites whileſt he charged the reſt: willing him that if he perceived that the Syrians were ſtronger then he was, and did put him to the worſt, to diſplace his Squadron, and to ſuccour him; promiſing to do the like, if he perceived him to be overpreſſed by the Ammonites: When as therefore he had exhorted his bro-
B ther to behave himſelf valiantly and vertuouſly, and to take heed leſt he ſhould light on ſome diſhonour, he ſent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other ſide aſſailed the Syrians, who valiantly reſiſted him for a little ſpace: yet notwithſtanding Joab ſlew many of them, and finally conſtrained them to turn their backs. Which when the Ammonites perceived (who were afraid of Abiſai and his people) they retreated likewiſe, and conforming themſelves according to the example of their allies, they took their flight into the Citie. By which means Joab having obtained the upper hand over his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victory unto the King to Jeruſalem.

Joab and Abiſaies armies, v. 9, 10, 11.

v. 12, 13, 14. Joabs victory.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this loſs: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certain knowledge that the Hebrewes were ſtronger then
C themſelves, yet would they by no means liſten after peace. They therefore ſent unto Chalama king of the Syrians on the other ſide of Euphrates, whoſe confederacy they attained by bribes and huge ſummes of money. This king had one, who was called Sabecus, for his Lieutenant Generall, and under him fourſcore thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſemen. David underſtanding that the Ammonites drew to head, and intended anew to bear arms againſt him, he forceaſed to proſecute the warre againſt them by his Lieutenants, and himſelf in perſon with all his forces paſſed over the river of Jordan, and went out againſt them; and at laſt meeting and fighting with them, overcame them, killing well-ny fourty thouſand of their footmen, and ſeven thouſand of their horſemen: he hurt Sabecus alſo, Chalamas Lieutenant, who likewiſe died of that wound. The iſſue of this combate being thus, the Meſo-
D potamians yielded themſelves unto David, and gave him many great and magnificent preſents. He therefore by reaſon of the winter retired himſelf for that time to Jeruſalem, but incontinently upon the Spring time he ſent out his Lieutenant Joab once more to make war upon the Ammonites: who overrunning their Countrey, utterly ſpoiled it, and ſhut them up in Aramath their principal City, which he overcame and entred. About this time it ſo fell out, that David (notwithſtanding he were a juſt man, and one that feared God, and an exact obſerver of all the laws and ordinances of his forefathers) fell, and offended God moſt grievouſly. For as he walked on the top of his royall Palace, from the time of mid-day untill the evening (for betwixt theſe times he uſed accuſtomably to walk) he perceived a woman of in-
E comparable beautie, and ſurpaſſing perfections, whoſe name was Bethſabe, who in her houſe bathed her ſelf in a clear and pleaſant Fountain: and being devoured and raviſhed with her beauty, he could not refrain his concupiſcence, but ſending for her, took the ſpoil of her beauty and chaſtity: and by that means got her with child. Which when ſhe perceived, ſhe ſent unto the King, beſeeching him to bethink himſelf of ſome means whereby her ſhame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazard by the law for her adultery) might be preſerved. Who thereupon ſent for Urias (Bethſabes husband, and one of Joabs ſouldiers, who at that time was at the ſiege of Aramath) and queſtioned with him upon his arrival, as touching the eſtate of the ſiege and of the army: who anſwering him that all things were ſaine out according as he could wiſh; David took a portion of his own ſupper and gave it him, willing him to repair unto his own houſe, and repoſe himſelf with his wife. But Urias did nothing
F leſs, but ſlept among his fellow ſouldiers near unto the perſon of the King. Which when David underſtood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his own houſe, according to the cuſtome of husbands that had been long time abſent upon a long voyage: and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had been ſequeſtred ſo many dayes? Urias replied, That it became him not either to repoſe or take pleaſure with his wife, whileſt his companions and General lay upon the bare ground in the enemies countrey. Which ſaid, David commanded him to ſojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might ſend him back again to Joab. That night the King invited him to ſupper, and although he were made drunk through the aboundance of wine he received, which the King had purposely caused to be given him (yet notwithstanding he slept at the Kings gate without any desire to repair home unto his wife.) Herewith the King was much despited, so that he wrote unto Joab, commanding him to punish Urias, because he had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his should not be discovered, he suggested him both in the means and manner of the prosecution of his death, enjoyning him to place him in the rank of greatest danger, and in face of the enemy, to the intent, that in the fight his person might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whilest they that fought next unto him, retired when they saw him charged. Whenas he had thus written and sealed up the letter with his own seal, he delivered it to Urias to bear unto Joab: who receiving the same, and conceiving the Kings pleasure, placed Urias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight most desperately, appointing him out certain of his best souldiers to second him, with purpose, that he would come and succour them with all his power, to the end he might break thorow the wall and enter the City.

v. 14, 15, 16, 17. David writeth unto Joab to punish Urias. Joab setteth Urias in a dangerous place to encounter with the enemie.

Urias (who was a noble souldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the King, and reputation amongst all those of his Tribe, and took delight to be imployed in hazardous attempts, and refused no danger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Joab gave private intelligence to those that were ranked next unto him, that when they should see the enemy sally out with greatest furie; they should abandon Urias. When as therefore the Hebrews drew neer unto the Citie, the Ammonites feared lest the enemy should speedily scale and enter the Citie on that side where Urias was ranked: for which cause they picked out a squadron of the most resolute men amongst them, and setting open their gates, suddenly with swift course, force and violence, they cast themselves upon their enemies. They that were near Urias seeing them draw near, retyred back again, according as Joab had before-hand commanded them: but Urias being ashamed to flie, or forsake his rank, expected the enemy, and valiantly encountring him, he slew divers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the midst of them, he was slain, and with him some others of his companions perished in the conflict. This done, Joab sent messengers unto the King, to certifie him, that not enduring the delay of the siege, and assaying and scaling the walls, he was compelled to return back into his camp, with loss of some men, and repulst from the City; yet had he commanded the messengers, that if they perceived the King to be displeased with the news, they should give him to understand that Urias was dead.

Urias is set with some associates to attempt the siege: the Ammonites sallying out, his company forsake him.

v. 18, 19, 20. Urias with some others is slain, and the King is certified thereof.

v. 20, 21. David is displeased with the news of his overthrow.

The King hearing this discourse (according as Joabs messengers had delivered it) made a shew to be displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him that he had so nearly approached the wall, alleadging that he might have done far better, to have taken the Town by Myne or Engine: urging in way of example, the act of Abimelech Gedeons son, who intending to surprize by force a Tower that was within the City of Tebez, was strucken with a stone that was cast at him by an old woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entring an action over rash and dangerous, shamefully died. "In remembrance of whose disaster, they ought to "have been more wary, and not to have approached the wall of the enemy so neerly. For "is is a very point in war, to have in memory both fatall and fortunate successes, to the end "that when a man is in the like dangers, he may follow the one, and flie the other. Whilest he thus rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Urias death, which did somewhat appease him: So that he commanded them to tell Joab, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of war, that sometime the one had the better, and sometime the other: To conclude, that he should provide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receive any further loss; counselling him by Trenches and Engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the Town, should be put to the sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things unto Joab, according to the Kings commandment. But Uriahs wife, having notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him divers dayes: and when the dole and lamentation were finished and performed to the dead; the King espoused her incontinent, and she bare him a man-childe: Yet God beheld not this marriage with a favourable eye, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dream, he blamed the King very sore. Now Nathan, who was a wise and experienced man, knew well that when Kings are displeased, they suffer themselves rather to be overcome by passion, then by reason: for which cause he determined to conceal the menaces and threatnings that God had made for that time; and discoursed of other profitable matters with David after this manner, requiring the King that it would please him to censure and deliver his opinion in the same. "Two men (said he) dwelt "in one and the same Citie: the one of them was rich, having many troops of great and "small cattel; the other that was poor, had but one onely sheep, which he nourished with his children.

Whereunto Nathan replyed, ſaying, That it was he that deſerved this puniſhment, who had given ſentence againſt himſelf; in that he had preſumed to commit ſo grievous a ſinne. Moreover, he certified him of Gods diſpleaſure, who notwithſtanding he had made

2. Sam. 12.

Nathan propheſieth of Davids puniſhment, and ſharply rebuketh him: he is condemned by his own mouth and repenteth himſelf.

After the King had received this meſſage, he was ſore troubled; and being confuſed, he powred forth tears and ſighed for ſorrow, confeſſing that he had done wickedly: for un-
C doubtedly before this time he had alwaies feared God, and had never in his life offended him, but in that act with Uriahs wife: whe eupon after his ſubmiſſion, God was appeaſed and took compaſſion of him, promiſing him to continue both his life and Kingdome, and that he would be no more diſpleaſed with him, if ſo be that he repented him of the ſinne he had committed. After that Nathan had declared theſe things unto David, he departed unto his own houſe. But God inflicted a grievous ſickneſſe on the infant that was born by Bethſabe: for which cauſe the King was ſore aggrieved, and for ſeven dayes ſpace would take no refe-
D ction; notwithſtanding that he was earneſtly inſtanted thereunto by his houſhold ſervants. He put on likewiſe a mourning habite, and laid himſelf on the ground upon a ſack: beſeech- ing him that it would pleaſe him to grant him the childs life, towards whoſe mother he bare ſo exceeding love and affection. But when the infant was deceaſed about the ſeventh day of his ſickneſſe, his ſervants durſt not certifie him thereof, ſuppoſing that if it ſhould come un- to his eare, he would the more obſtinately abſtain from eating, and the care of his perſon ſhould be in danger by reaſon of his diſordinate griefe for his childe, to procure and haſten his own death, conſidering he had ſo vehemently been afflicted and tormented for his one- ly ſickneſſe. But the King perceiving by their looks that his ſervants were troubled, and that they concealed ſome fatall harm, and gathering thereby that his ſonne was dead: he called unto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, he aroſe and waſhed himſelf, and put on a white garment, and preſented himſelf before the tabernacle of God,
E and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and ſervants were very ſore amazed, and wondred why he having done none of theſe things during the childs ſick- neſſe, ſhould now after his death do all theſe things at once; they beſought him therefore that it might be lawfull for them to demand the cauſe of theſe his proceedings. To whom he anſwered, that he would teach and diſcover that unto them, of which they were ignorant. Underſtand you not (ſaid he) that while the childe was alive, and I had hope of his recovery, I omitted no means whereby I might move God unto mercy? but now after that he is dead, it were in vain for me to ſpend my ſelf with unneceſſarie griefe. Which when they heard, they praiſed the wiſedome and conſideration of the King. After this he knew Bethſabe his wife, who became with childe, and was brought abed of a ſonne, who (by Nathans direction)
F was called Solomon. Mean while Ioab preſſed the Ammonites with a ſore ſiege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things neceſſarie; ſo that they were wellnigh famiſhed for want of victuall and proviſion: for they drew their water from a little ſpring in ſuch ſort, that they feared leſt if they ſhould uſe it to their own contentment, it would be ſuddenly drie. He therefore wrote unto the King, and certified him of the eſtate of the City, and ex- horted him to come in perſon, and be preſent at the ſurpriſall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be fained by his name.

David ſurprizing Rabbatha by force, giveth it for a prey to his ſouldiers.

The King underſtanding that which Ioab had written, allowed of his readineſſe, good- will, and faith, and taking with him all the forces which he had, he came to the taking in of Rabatha, which being by him forcibly ſurpriſed and given in pillage unto his ſouldiers, he retained for himself the crown of the King of the Ammonites weighing a talent of gold, in G the midst whereof was enchased a Sardonyx of great value, which David wore upon his head. He found likewise in that citie divers spoils of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the cities of the Ammonites which he took by force. But after that the King was returned unto Jerusalem, there fell a grievous accident in his family upon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull, and surpassed all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, born by the same mother that Absalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of David became enamoured: and for that he could not enjoy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginitie, and the hand that was had over her) he grew so melancholy that his body dried up, and his colour changed through the very griefe that consumed him. A certain cousin and friend of his called Ionathan (a man of great reach and quick understanding) per- H ceiving that his passion, and noting every day how Amnons beautie and strength decayed and wasted, came unto him and asked him the cause thereof, alledging that that indispostion of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was grown passionate through the love he bare unto his sister by the fathers side, Ionathan suggested him both the means and invention to compasse his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himself to be sick, and that if his father came to visit him, he should desire him to send his sister to minister unto him, by which means he should easily and speedily be delivered of his sickness. This counsell of his was plausible in Amnons ears, who presently counterfeited sickness; and laid him down on his bed (according as Ionathan had advised him) and when David was come to visit him, he required him to send his sister unto I him, which he did. She being arrived, he prayed her, that with her own hands, she would temper, and fry some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her own making: for which cause she in her brothers presence tempered the flowre, and made certain cakes and fried them in the frying pan, and presented them unto him:

but he tasted them not, but commanded all his servants to retyre themselves out of his lodging, because he intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soon as this commandment of his was performed, he prayed his sister to bring the meat into his most retired and privie chamber: whereunto the damosel condescended, whereupon he suddenly surprised her, and began to perswade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said unto him: Forbear, my brother, forbear to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Give over this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which K will breed nought else but disgrace and infamie to our whole familie; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, require me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from me by force. But he inraged with love, neglected all these sayings, and wholly poisoned with the sting of disordinate passion, ravished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist.
And assoon as he had aslaked his lustfull desire, a certain hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many injurious words against Thamar: so that he commanded her to arise and depart. She answered, that this second outrage was more hainous then the former; for that having violated her, he would not suffer her to remain there untill night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, and during the light, to the end she might L meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: Notwithstanding all these just reasons of hers, he commanded his servant to drive her out of the doors. She strangely aggrieved at the outrage and violence that had beene offered her, tore her garment (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the Citie with cries and lamentations, wherein she expressed what wrong had been done unto her. With her thus distracted, her brother Absalon met, enquiring of her what evill hap had befallen her. To whom she reported all the injurie which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her self, and to suffer moderately whatsoever had befallen her; and not to suppose her self to be indignified by an act of her brother. Whereupon she condescended, forbearing her exclaims, and surceasing to publish the M injuries she had received in the ears of the people. And thus remained shē a long time with her brother Absalon in the qualitie of a widow.

David having intelligence of that which had hapned, was sore displeased, notwithstanding he loved Amnon very entirely, who was his eldest sonne, and would not disquiet him: but Absalon hated him extreamely, expecting (without any word speaking) for some fit opportunitie, wherein he might revenge himselfe on the ravisher. Now when as two yeers were expired since his sister was both derided and deflowred, it chanced that Absalon intending a sheep-shearing in Belsephon, a Citie of the tribe of Ephraim, invited his father and brethren

CHAP. VIII.

How through the Domeſtical diſcord of his family, DAVID was baniſhed by his ſon out of his Kingdome.

B AFter that Abſalons ſervants had thus executed his commandment, a trouble and fear ſeized all the reſt of his brethren, inſomuch as they ſuſpected their own perſons: for which cauſe mounting themſelves on horſ-back, they poſted all in haſte towards their father. But a certain man out-ſtripping them in the way, reported unto David that Abſalon had ſlain all his ſons. Who ſurprized with a bitter and mortall fear, in ſuppoſing that ſuch a number of his children ſhould be ſlain, and that by their own brother, neither inquired the cauſe nor any thing elſe which might be ſifted out in ſo greivous an inconvenience that had happened, but gave himſelf over to extream and ſtrange diſcomforts, and renting his garments, laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both thoſe that were ſlain, as him alſo that had ſlain them. But Jonathan C the ſonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his paſſion, telling him that he could not be perſwaded that the reſt of his children were ſlain, in that he could conceive no probable cauſe of conjecture. But as touching Amnon, their needed no queſtion, for that it was very like that Abſalon (by reaſon of the injury which was offered unto his ſiſter Thamar) would hazard himſelf to kill him. Mean-while a great trample of horſes, and a confuſed troup of men brake off their diſcourſe. Theſe were the Kings ſonnes, who returned in poſt from the banquet: Againſt theſe the father iſſued out, accompanying their doleful tears with a heavie and ſorrowful countenance: And ſeeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he ſuppoſed to be loſt, returned in ſafetie, they were all of them on every ſide given over to tears and lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the King his murthered ſon. But Abſalon fled into Geſſur (unto his D Grandfather on the mothers ſide, and Lord of that place) and ſojourned with him three whole years: at the end whereof David determined to ſend for his ſon Abſalon, not to the intent to puniſh him, but to retire him unto him (by reaſon that the indignation he had conceived againſt him, was at that time aſſaked) Joab alſo furthered this his reſolution by all means that were to him poſſible: For he cauſed a certain old woman attired in mourning habite, to preſent her ſelf before David, who ſaid unto him, that betwixt her two ſonnes "that lived in the Countrey, there hapned ſuch a difference, that falling to handieſtrokes, "they were ſo whet the one againſt the other, that not indureing to be parted, the one of "them in ſuch ſort wounded the other that he died; and for that the kinſmen were ſore E "moved againſt the murtherer, and ſought without mercy to deprive him of life, ſhe humbly "beſought the King that he would give her her ſons life, and not deprive her of that hope "that remained her to ſuſtain her old years with; which he ſhould bring to paſs, if ſo be he "prohibited thoſe that would kill her ſon from executing their intents: for that except it "were for fear which they had of him, they would by no means be withdrawn from their fa- "tal and bloudy reſolution. Now when as the King had granted her requeſt, the woman be- "gan once more to break into theſe ſpeeches: I moſt humbly thank your Majeſty (ſaid ſhe) "who have had compaſſion of mine age, and do ſo providently foreſee that I be not depri- "ved of my ſon; but to the intent I may be the better aſſured of thy humanitie, I beſeech "thee (O King) firſt of all pacifie thy diſpleaſure conceived againſt thy ſon, and be no more F "incenſed againſt him: For how can I perſwade my ſelf that you will do me this grace, if "you your ſelf even until this day continue your diſpleaſure conceived upon the like occa- "ſion againſt your ſon? For it is contrary to the rules of wiſedom, to adde to the remedileſs "loſs of one ſon, the hapleſs death of a fathers living hope. Upon theſe words the King be- "gan preſently to ſuſpect that Joab had ſuborned this woman, and underſtanding no leſs by "the old womans report, he ſent for Joab, and told him that he granted him that which he "deſired, commanding him to ſend for Abſalon, aſſuring him that his diſpleaſure was pacified, "and choler aſſwaged. Joab caſt himſelf down proſtrate before the King, and reverently re- "ceiving his word of reconciliation, went unto Geſſur and fet Abſalon from thence with him "and brought him to Jeruſalem. out a messenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he should not presume to press into his presence, because he was not disposed to behold him so suddenly. Who understanding the will of his father, forbore to shew himself unto him, and went and dwelt amongst his own familiars and household servants: Neither was his beautie any way decreased by the sorrow he had conceived, or for that his entertainment was far different from the bringing up and nourishing of a Princes sonne; but he rather exceeded and grew more famous thereby: so that for beauty and goodlinesse of personage, he excelled all those that lived more deliciously and daintily: his glibband or hair was so thick, that it could scarcely be powled in eight dayes, and weighed two hundred sickles, which amount to five pound. He lived also two years in Jerusalem, and was the father of three sons, and one fair daughter, which Roboam the son of Salomon afterwards took to wife, of whom he begat a son called Abia. In processe of time he sent messengers unto Joab, that now at length he would pacifie his father, and beseech him to admit him to his presence, that he might both see and submit himself unto him. But because Joab made small reckoning of these his motions, he sent of his servants, and commanded them to burn and spoil Joabs possessions that abutted upon his: who hearing of that which had happened unto him, resorted unto Absalon, accusing him, and questioning with him for what cause he had done him this injurie. To whom Absalon answered: I have (said he) invented this stratagem to make thee come unto me, seeing thou madest small account of my commissions, whereby I have charged thee to reconcile me unto my father. And at this present I beseech thee that thou wilt move my father in my behalf; otherwise, I shall think my return more grievous then my banishment hath been, if so be my father shall as yet continue his displeasure. Joab was perswaded through the compassion he conceived of the necessity wherein he saw him, and went and solicited the King, with whom he so effectually debated, as touching Absolon, that altering his contrary disposition, he graciously and speedily sent and called for him. As soon as he came unto his presence, Absalon cast himself prostrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: but David raised and lifted him up, and promised that from thence-forth he would no more upbraid him with those misdeeds. After all these things had thus fallen out, Absalon within a little space assembled a great number of horses and Chariots, and entertained fifty men for his guard, and every day early in the morning presented himself before the Kings Palace, and talked with those that resorted thither about the triall of their differences: and whereas some of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alleadging that his father had no good counsellers, and that perhaps he himself had in some things judged amiss: and by these means indeavoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them that if he had the like authoritie, he would make them know by proof what his equitie was. Having by these plawsible perswasions drawn the hearts of the common people unto him, he thought himself already seized of their services in whatsoever he intended.

Some four years after his reconciliation, he came to his father David, requiring of him that he might go to Hebron and sacrifice unto God, according as he had vowed at such time as he fled from his presence. Which request of his when David had granted him, he resorted thither, being attended with great affluence and concourse of all the people (by reason he had appointed divers to meet him in that place, amongst whom was Achitophel the Gelmonite, one of Davids counsellers, and 200. others of Jerusalem, who altogether ignorant of his enterprize assembled themselves in that place to be assistant to his sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, according as he himself had commanded them to do. When the news hereof came unto Davids ears, and he was throughly ascertained beyond all conceit, how his sonne had behaved himselfe; he suspected and doubted his impiety and arrogancie: wondring that he should so soon and so lewdly forget himself of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrary to all law plunge himselfe and hazard his reputation in more grievous offences: as first of all, to pervert the estate of the kingdome which God had established: and secondly, in complotting to deprive and degrade his own father. For which cause he determined to flie to the other side of Jordan, conducting with him his most inward and hearty friends, to whom he reported the unbridled fury of his sonne, remitting all things unto God who judgeth all things; and leaving the government of his royall house to the disposition of his six concubines, he departed from Jerusalem. With him issued an affectionate and great number of people; besides those six hundreth souldiers, who had followed him in his banishment during Sauls life time. And although the high priests Abiather and Sadoc with all the Levites had concluded to depart with him, yet perswaded he them to abide with the Ark, assuring them that God would deliver them; yea, although the Ark were unremoved from his place. He commanded Abiather likewise to send

But Ethæus the Gittite by no perswasions of the King could be induced to stay, but contrary to his command followed him, whereby he more manifestly expressed his affection towards him. But as he mounted and ascended on his bare feet upon the mountain of Olivet, and all they of his train followed him (entermixing their travel with bitter tears) a certain messenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Absalon, and held on his side. Which report aggravated and increased his grief: so that he besought God, that it might please him to alienate the affection of Absolon from Achitophel, for fear lest if he should give him some sinister counsel, he might easily be perswaded thereunto; because that Achitophel was a man of ripe judgment, and ready execution in all that concerned him. As soon as B he came unto the top of the mountain, he beheld the City: and as if he had utterly been banished from his kingdom, he began with abundant tears to call upon God. There met he with Chusai his sincere and unfained friend, whom when he beheld with his garments rent, with ashes on his head, and lamenting the unhappy change which he had beheld: David cheered him, and exhorted him to be no wayes discomforted; and finally, besought him to return unto Asalon, as under a colour that he had forsaken his part, where diligently prying into his secrets, he might oppose himself against Achitophels counsels, because he might not so much pleasure him in keeping him company, as in staying with Absalon: Chusai being after this manner perswaded by David, returned back to Jerusalem, where presently after he encountred with Absalon, who repaired thither. In the mean time David marching onward C a little further, chanced to meet with Siba, Mephiboseths servant, and Purveyor of all those goods which David had given him (for that he was Jonathans son, who was the son of Saul.) This man drave before him two Asses loaden with victuals, which he presented to David and his company, to refresh themselves with; and being demanded where he had left Mephiboseth: In Jerusalem (said he) where he expecteth to be chosen King, through the occasion of those troubles that had hapned, and in memory of the benefits that divers men had received at Sauls hands. David displeased with that which he heard, gave Siba all those riches wherewith he had gratified Mephiboseth in times past, deeming him more worthy of the same then Mephiboseth. Wherewith Siba was very highly contented.

When David drew near unto a place which is called Choran, a certain cousin of Sauls, called D Simei, the son of Gera, came out against him, and cast stones at him, and reviled him; and the more Davids friends invironed and defended him, the more obstinately persevered he in his reproofs and scandalous railings: calling him murtherer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an impure and inexecrable man to get him out of the Kingdom, giving God thanks for that he had deprived him of his Kingdom by the means of his own son, and in punishment of those crimes which he had committed against his own master. This his so cruell and unbridled libertie, moved all Davids followers to displeasure; so that all of them were prepared to revenge them on Simei; and amongst the rest Abisai would have slain him: but David pacified his displeasure, willing him to forbear, for fear (said he) lest to our present mi- "series we annex a further and new occasion. For in as much as concerneth my self, I set light E "by this mad dog, and refer the matter to God, who is the cause that he is thus desperately "bent against us. Neither is it to be wondred at, that I suffer these outrages by him, sith mine "own son is so wicked, as he taketh a felicity to disdain me; but it may be that God will have "compassion on us, and if he please, we shall have the upper hand over our enemies. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei said, who ran on the other side of the mountain, railing and reviling at him. When David was arrived on the bank of Jordan, he mustered and refreshed his army, who were sore wearied: mean while Absalon entring Jerusalem with Achitophel his counseller, was saluted and applauded by the whole concourse of the people; and among the rest, Davids friend came unto them, who prostrating himself before Absalons feet, wished him both prosperitie and perpetuity in his Kingdom. Him did Absalon F ask how it came to pass, that he who was reputed to be one of Davids most indeared friends, and esteemed alwayes to be most loyal and faithful unto him, should at that time (when most occasion was proferred him to express his loyaltie) abandon him, and submit himself to his enemy? To him Chusai answered both readily and wisely, that it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

2 Sam. 17. v. 1, ad 14. Achitophels counſel perſwading Abſalon to purſue David. Chuſais oppoſition.

WHen Abſolon had done that which Achitophel had inſtructed him in, he requeſted him once more to counſel him concerning that war which he had enterprized againſt his father: who required ten thouſand choſen men at his hand, promiſing him to kill David, and to bring all the reſt that were in his conduct under his ſubjection: aſſuring him that Abſalons kingdom would be then eſtabliſhed, when Davids head were I cut off from his ſhoulders. When this advice of his had highly contented him, he ſent for Chuſai, who was the chiefeſt amongſt Davids friends (for ſo David himſelf had termed him) to whom he diſcovered the advice which Achitophel had given him, and required him to give his opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well that if Achitophels counſel were followed, David ſhould be in danger to be apprehended and ſlain, enforced all his arguments and counſels to the contrary. "For, ſaid he, my Liege, you are ſufficiently informed "both what your fathers valour is, and their vertue that accompany him; who hath fought "many battels, and hath had the upper hand over all his enemies. It is to be feared alſo leſt "he at this preſent be encamped in the field. For, he is well exerciſed in leading armies, K
"to prevent any ſtratagems, whereby the enemy may invade him, and about the evening he "hath perhaps left his men hidden in ſome ſtreight, or in ambuſh behinde ſome rock: and "and if our men ſhall aſſaile him, his ſouldiers will by little and little retire, and afterward recover ng courage, by reaſon that the king ſhall be near unto them, they will charge "us afreſh; and during their medley, your father will ſuddenly break out of his ambuſh, "and encourage his own men, and diſcomfort yours: wiſely therefore examine mine advice, and if you finde that it be good, neglect that which Achitophel hath given you. Send "me thorow all the countrey of the Hebrews, commanding every one to take armes and "march out againſt your father: and when you have gathered together theſe forces, be your "ſelf in perſon the General of the army, and commit it not to anoth. r mans charge, and aſſu- L

And if ſo be your father ſhut himſelf up in any City, we will and may ſubvert the ſame by Mines and engines. This advice of his ſeemed to be better then that of Achitophels, ſo that Abſalon preferred the ſame. For it was God that put this thought into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and reſpect Chuſai's counſel.

v. 14. Chuſais counſel accepted: Achitophels rejected.

Now when Chuſai had thus prevailed, he preſently repaired to the high Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, certifying them what Achitophel had complotted, and how he had contradicted him; finally, how his opinion had taken place, giving them in charge to ſend private intelli- M

A who presently upon this intelligence, like good and faithful ministers, posted withall speed to report their fathers news unto the King.

The Jew of the World.2910. before the Nativity of Christ, 1044.

But scarcely had they travelled two furlongs, when certain horsemen discovered them, and brought news thereof unto Absalon, who presently sent out scouts to apprehend them: which when the children of the high Priests perceived, they forsook the high-way, and incontinently retired themselves into a certain village near unto Jerusalem, which is called Bocchura, where they besought a certain woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of security, who let them down into a pit, and covered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. She being demanded by those that pursued them, whether she saw them, denied the same, saying, that as soon as she had given them drink, they departed from her presently;

B assuring them that if they presently and speedily pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not finde them, they returned from whence they came. The woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cause of fear, left the young men should be surprized, she drew them out of the pit, and set them onward of their way: who, with as great speed as was possible resorted unto David, and declared unto him exactly what Absalons deliberation was. Hereupon David passed the flood Jordan presently with all his men, and although it were night, could not be withdrawn by reason of the darkness.

v.22. David informed of Absalons deliberation, passeth himself and his whole army over Jordan by night.

But Achitophel seeing that his opinion had been reproved, took his horse and suddenly repaired unto his countrey of Gelmone: there calling together his household servants be-

C fore him, he discovered unto them what advice he had given Absalon; which since he had not accepted, he told them that shortly they should see him dead, alledging that David would have the upper hand in the war, and should return into his kingdom. It is better therefore, said he, for me, with a great minde, and as it becometh a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my self to Davids punishment for partaking with Absalon, and giving him counsel. This said, he repaired himself into the most secret part of his house, and hung himself, being both his own Judg and executioner; after which, his kinsmen cut him down and buried him. But David (as we said) having past Jordan, came and encamped in a strong citie, the most defenced in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great benevolence by all the noble men of that countrey, partly moved thereunto by the mans present neces-

These were Berzillai the Galaadite, Siphar the Governour of the province of the Ammonites, and Machir the chief of the countrey of Galaad, who gave David and his whatsoever they wanted in abundance: so that they lacked neither beds, nor bread, nor flesh, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sick & wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serve for repose or refection. In this estate remained he. But Absalon assembled a great multitude of people to make war upon his father, and after he had passed Jordan, he pitched his tents near unto his fathers, within the countrey of Galaad, and made Amasa General of his army, opposing him against Joab his cousin: for Amasa's father was Jethar, and his sister was Abigail, sister to Sarvia, mother to Joab. When David had mustered and numbered his forces, and found that he had

E fourtie thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently to hazard battel, and not to expect till Absalon should charge upon them.

He therefore ordained Colonels over thousands of his men, and divided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gave in charge to Joab; the second to Abisai his brother; and he third to Ethaus his familiar friend (who was of the citie of Geth.) In this battel his friends would not admit his presence (and that upon good and deep consideration) for they said, that if they should be defeated in his company they should utterly lose all good hope: but if one squadron should be overcome, the rest might have recourse unto him, who might assemble unto them and strengthen them with greater force; the rather for that the enemies would alwaies think it likely, that he had some other army with him. This counsel of theirs seemed pleasing unto him, for which cause he remained within the City. But at such

F time as he sent out his friends unto the battel, he besought them (that in remembrance of all the benefits and favours he had bestowed on them) they would both shew themselves couragious and faithful men in the fight, and that having obtained the victory, they would spare his son, for fear left his death should increase, and redouble his discontents. Thus praying God to give them victory, he dismissed them to enter battel. But when as Joab had planted his army right over against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plain, having a wood upon their backs; Absalon also drew out his army against him. So that encountring, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazarding themselves in all dangers, and employing all their

Besides that, they held it an indignity for them, that being so great in number as they were, they should be surmounted by such a handful of people as followed Joab: deeming it to be an utter disgrace unto them, that being so many thousands of them in arms, they should be discomfited by Davids followers.

v.8,9. The fight and overthrow of Absalons army.

But Joab and his men being more skilful and trained in feats of arms then the rest, discomfited and brake Absalons army so that they fled through woods and steep places. Davids souldiers pursuing after them, took some, and slew othersome; so that both in flight and fight a great number of them were put to the sword: for there fell that day about twenty thousand men. But all Davids troupes freshly set upon Absalon, who was easily known by reason of his absolute beauty, and high stature: he fearing to be surprised by his enemies, mounted upon his royal mule, and fled in great hast. And for that by swift motion of his body, his locks were scattered abroad, his bush of haire was intangled in a thick and branchie tree, where he hung after a strange manner, and his mule ran onward with great swiftnesse, as if she had H as yet born her master on her back: but he hanging by the hair amidst the branches, suddenly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certain souldier perceived, he brought news thereof unto Joab, who promised him to give him fifty sicles, if he would kill him.

The souldier answered, that if he would give him two thousand, he would not commit such a murther on the son of his Soveraign, the rather for that in the presence of them all, David had requested them to spare him. Hereupon Joab commanded him to shew him the place where he had seen Absalon hang: who no sooner discovered him, but thrusting a Javelin to his heart, he slew him. That done, Joabs Esquires arrounded the tree, took him down; and casting him into a deep and obscure pit, they overwhelmed him with stones: so that in appearance it seemed to be a tomb, or some great, high, and stately monument. had erected in the royal valley two furlongs distant from Jerusalem a Marble pillar, which he had intituled by the name of Absalons Hand; saying, that when his children should be dead, his name should remain in that pillar. Now he had three sons, and a daughter which was called Thamar, as we have said heretofore, who was married unto Roboam, Davids Nephew, and had by him a son called Abia, who succeeded his father in the kingdom: of whom we will speak more conveniently in his place.

v.21,and 22. Chusai sent to certifie David of the victory.

AFter that Absalon was slain, all the people returned privately to their own houses: but Achimaas the son of the high Priest Sadoc drew near unto Joab, requiring his licence to repair unto David, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods help and providence he had obtained the victory. This did the General deny him, telling him that it was not convenient that he, who before-times was wont to bring joyful news, should now certifie the King of his sons death. L
He therefore commanded him to stay, and calling Chusai to his presence, he gave him commission to certifie the King of that which he had seen. Achimaas requested him the second time that he would suffer him to go, promising him that he would make no mention but of the victory; and that as touching Absalons death, he would not utter any thing: whereupon he dismissed him also, who chusing the shorter way (which he onely knew) outstripped Chusai. Now as David sate in the gate of the Citie (expecting some messenger that might certifie him of the success of the battel) one of the Sentinels perceiving Achimaas, that came running hastily, and unable to discover who it was, told David that he saw a messenger coming towards him: who answered that it was some one that brought joyful news. Anon after he told him that a certain other messenger followed: To whom David an- M swered likewise, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceived that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the high Priests son, and that he was neer at hand, he ran first of all and certified David; who was very glad thereof, saying, that he brought some good and desired news as touching the event of the battel: and no sooner had the King spoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himself upon his face before David, to whom he reported that his armie had the victory. Being afterwards demanded what was become

A become of Abſalon? He anſwered, that he incontinently departed from the Campe as ſoon as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certaine cry of ſouldiers that purſued Abſalon: and further then that he knew nothing, becauſe by Ioabs commandement he was ſpeedily ſent away to bring tidings of the victory. When Chuſai was come and had humbled himſelfe before the King, and had declared unto him the ſucceſſe of the battell, the queſtion was asked how Abſalon did? Whereunto he anſwered: The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Abſalon. Theſe words quite extinguiſhed the delight and joy that David conceived in the victory, and wholly amated his faithfull ſouldiers: for as touching the King, he aſcending the higheſt part of the City, bewailed his ſonne, beating his breſt, tearing his haire, and afflicting himſelfe in all kindes, and after ſuch a ſort, as B may not be expreſſed; and crying out in a mournfull manner: My ſon (ſaid he) would God, my ſonne, that I were dead with thee, that I might be with thee. For wh reas of his own nature he was a very loving man, yet loved he Abſalon above all other moſt tenderly.

v. 33. David hearing of Abſalons death by Chuſai, grievouſly bewaileth him.

When the armie and Ioab were informed that David lamented his ſonne in this ſort, they had this reſpect, that they would not enter the Citie after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them moſt tenderly, as if they had returned from ſome diſcomfiture. But when as the King having his head covered, perſevered in his deſire to bewaile his ſonne, Ioab entred in unto him, and ſaid, O King, you conſider not that in this behaviour of yours, you diſhonour your ſelfe: for it is to be thought that you hate thoſe that love you, and expoſe themſelves to all perils for your love; yea, that C you hate your ſelfe and your own ſucceſſion: and that contrariwiſe, you love your moſt mortall enemies moſt entirely, ſith you bewaile them that were no leſſe, and who are juſtly deprive of their lives. For if Abſalon had had the victory, and had poſſeſſed the Kingdome in aſſurance, there had not any one of us been left alive that love you, but had all of us ſuffered a moſt hated death; nay, and in the firſt rank your ſelfe and your own children: neither would they being our enemies have lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea they would puniſh them likewiſe who ſhould have any compaſſion of our miſeries: yet art thou not aſhamed to lament after this manner, for ſuch a man as moſt extremely hated thee, who notwithſtanding he were thine own ſon, was ſo ungrateſull and ungracious towards the. Deſiſt therefore from they unjuſt lamentation, and offer thy ſelfe in preſence to thy well-deſer- " ving ſouldiers, and give them thanks, that by their vertue have obtained thee this victory: " D otherwiſe if thou continue as thou haſt begun, this day will I tranſlate both the Kingdome " & the army from thee, and give thee occaſion more grievouſly and truely to lament thee of " thy misfortunes then thou didſt before. By theſe words Ioab pacified and allaied the Kings " lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common-weale: for clothing himſelfe in a " royall habite, whereby he might ſeeme more gracious in the ſight of his ſouldiers, he ſate him down in the gate: ſo that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to ſalute him.

For which cauſe it behooved them, ſith he was dead whom they had choſen, to make their ſupplication and ſubmiſſion unto David, that diſmiſſing his wrath, he would receive the people into his favour, and according as before-time, ſo now alſo he would vouchſafe them his pardon and protection. Of theſe things ſundry intelligences came unto the Kings eare, ſo that by expreſſe letters he commanded Sadoc and Abiather the chiefe Prieſts, that they would certifie the Princes of the tribe of Iuda, that it ſhould be a great indignitie for them, that other tribes ſhould preferre David to the Kingdome before them, eſpecially ſith he was both of their tribe, and their kinſman alſo. In like manner he commanded them to ſpeak with Amaſa the Generall, and expoſtulate with F him, why he who was his Nephew by the ſiſters ſide, did not perſwade the army to recommend the Kingdome to his hands: willing them to aſſure him that he was not onely to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but alſo for the government of the whole army, according as Abſalon had granted him. Hereupon the high Prieſt not onely conferred with the Princes aforeſaid, but alſo informed Amaſa what the King had promiſed in his behalfe, whereby they drew him to their faction. And firſt of all, thoſe of his owne tribe revoked David very inſtantly into the Kingdome: the reſt of the Iſraelites, by their example and Amaſas authoritie, did the like alſo; and theſe Ambaſſadors flocked unto him to receive him into Jeruſalem. But wonderfull and praiſe-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Iuda, who went out as farre as the banke of Jordan to meet with him: with theſe came

Simei

Simei the ſon of Gera, with a thouſand men, which he had brought with him of the Tribe of Benjamin; Siba likewiſe Sauls freman came thither with his fifteen ſons, and twentie ſervants: who made a bridge over Jordan, that the King might the more eaſily paſs over, both himſelf and his Army. As ſoon as he came unto Jordan, he was ſaluted by the Tribe of Juda: and Simei marched onward on the bridge, and proſtrating himſelf at the Kings feet, asked pardon of his offences, and beſought him to remit his diſpleaſure: and that in recovering his authoritie, he would not firſt of all do juſtice on him, but that he ſhould remember this alſo, that he being reduced by the repentance of his errour, did with the formoſt march out to meet him upon his return. Whileſt thus he beſought and lamented, Abiſai, Joabs brother, ſpake after this manner: Why ſhould he not die that hath thus villanouſly outraged the King, whom God hath eſtabliſhed? But David turned back unto him, and ſaid: Ye ſons of Servia, will you never ceaſe to hatch new troubles; and to adde new diviſions to your former commotions? Know ye not that this is the firſt day of my reigne? For which cauſe I ſware an oath that I will pardon all them that have committed any impietie againſt me, and that no one man ſhall depart from me in my diſfavour. For which cauſe be of good cheer Simei, and fear thou not that I will ſeek thy blood. Whereupon he adored the King, and marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboſeth, Sauls nephew, came out to meet him, cloathed in a deſolate and ſorry rayment, having his hairs hanging down in a neglected and ſorrowful manner. For ſince the time that David fled and forſook the Citie, he had been in ſuch ſort diſtreſſed, that he neither had trimmed his hair, nor changed or cleanſed his garment, ſuppoſing this calamitie and diſpoſition to touch him as nearly, as it did the King: and further, in that by Siba his ſteward, he had been unjuſtly detracted and accuſed to the King. After he had proſtrated himſelf, and adored the King, David asked him for what cauſe he forſook him in his troubles? and offered himſelf to accompany him in his flight? "Who anſwered, that it was the the wickedneſs of Siba, who was the cauſe "thereof: for he, ſaid he, being commanded to prepare my neceſſaries for that journey, neg- "lected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had beeen ſome abject "ſlave: Otherwiſe, had I had the uſe of my feet, and the means to have waited on thee in thy "journey, I had never endured to have forſaken thee. Neither was he contented (my Liege) "to hinder my devout ſervice toward thee, but furthermore, he hath malicioufly incenſed "your Majeſty againſt me: yet know I well, that your wiſedom will not admit to give cre- "dit to his detractions, both for that you are juſt, as alſo for that GOD and truth, which you "onely aſpire to, are onely beloved by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers dayes, you "were alwayes converſant amongſt the moſt difficult dangers, and followed and attempted "by him; and whereas all our poſterity by that means deſerved to be utterly extinguiſhed, "yet have you uſed both moderation and meekneſs, eſpecially in forgetting thoſe indigni- "ties at ſuch time as the memory thereof afforded you means to puniſh them. And "notwithſtanding all theſe things, you have entertained me like your friend, feaſted me "at your dayly table, and dignified me with no leſs honours, then if I had been one of your "neareſt and deareſt kinſmen. When David had heard theſe things, he thought neither good to puniſh Mephiboſeth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accuſed him; but after he had certified him, that he had given Siba all his goods, yet did he pardon him, and promiſe him the reſtitution of half his poſſeſſions. Whereunto Mephiboſeth replied: Let Siba (ſaith he) poſſeſs the whole, it onely ſufficeth me that I ſee your Majeſty reſtored again into your Kingdom. After this David invited Berzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man and of great authoritie, and by whoſe bounty during the time of his war, he was aſſiſted, and who had attended him as far as Jordan) to accompany him unto Jeruſalem, promiſing him to make no leſs account of him then of his father, and aſſuring him liberally to allow him all things that concerned his honour and age. But he being deſirous to live in private, beſought his Majeſty to diſmiſs him from the Court, becauſe (as he ſaid) his age was ſo extreme, as it made him unapt for courtly pleaſures, conſidering that he had attained to the age of foure-ſcore years: alledging that it better became him to think of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cauſe he beſought David to favour him ſo much, as that he might govern himſelf according to his own deſire, becauſe that by reaſon of his age, he neither knew how to ſavour meat nor drink; beſides, for that his hearing was loſt, ſo that he could not diſtinguiſh nor diſcern the ſound of inſtruments, wherein they who converſe in Kings Courts, do moſt uſually take ſuch delight.

To this David replied, Sith (ſaid he) thou doſt ſo inſtantly requeſt me to give thee leave to depart from me, I diſmiſs thee: but leave thou thy ſon Achimaas with me, who ſhall be maſter of my many favours. Hereupon Berzillai left his ſon with him, and taking leave of the King

A King (with prayer that God would grant him the fulneſſe of all his deſires) he returned to his own houſe. But David went unto Galgal (having already the half part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Juda.) Thither reſorted then unto him the chiefe Governours of that country, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining unto the tribe of Juda, for that unwitting to the reſt they had reſorted to him, when as by a mutuall conſent they ſhould all of them have met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Juda requeſted them in no ſort to miſconſtrue their prevention of them. For that by reaſon of their alliance they had done this office, whereby being tied unto him, they were bound with more fervent ſtudy to do him ſervice: for neither in reſpect of that diligence of theirs received they any rewards, whereby they that came after ſhould think themſelves prejudiced in profit. This anſwer of theirs the Princes of the Tribes took not in good part, but thus they ſpake unto B their brethren: We wonder (ſaid they) that you onely challenge the King to be your kinſman, as if he were not to be accounted an allie unto us all, whom God hath equally placed to be Governour over us all; when as therefore the whole people conſiſteth of eleven parts, you onely are but one; beſides we are your elders: ſo that you have not dealt uprightly, in that you have ſecretly and covertly ſought out the king. Whileſt the Governours in this ſort debated the matter with them, a certain wicked and ſeditious perſon call d Siba the ſon of Bochri, of the tribe of Benjamin, ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, began to cry out with a loud voice, and to exclaime after this manner: We have no part with David, nor inheritance with the ſon of Jeſſe. This ſaid he ſounded a trumpet, and proclaimed war againſt the king, ſo that all men followed him, and forſook David. Onely the tribe Juda remained with him, and
C eſtabliſhed him in the royall Throne in Jeruſalem: where removing his concubines (which his ſon Abſalon had known) out of his palace, he never after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amaſa General of the army, and placed him in the ſame degree which Joab had, near unto the perſon of the King; commanding him that he ſhould aſſemble the greateſt forces that he might out of the tribe of Juda, and that within three daies he ſhould return unto him, to the end that having delivered him both the army and the place of Generall, he might ſend him to make war upon the ſon of Bochri. After that Amaſa was departed, and employed his time in gathering up his army; the king ſeeing that he failed to return upon the third day, told Joab that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater
D head by delay: and thereby breed us more trouble and moleſtation then Abſalon had done. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſtay thou not, but take unto thee thoſe forces which thou haſt in readineſſe, and my ſix hundreth men with thy brother Abiſai, and purſue thou the enemy, and in what place ſoever thou meeteſt him, by all means endeavour thy ſelf to give him the battell. Haſte thee therefore, and overtake him, for fear leſt he ſeize ſome of our ſtrongeſt cities, and thereby procure us much travell and labour. Joab with all expedition obeyed his commandement, and took with him the foreſaid ſix hundreth, with his brother Abiſai, and commanded all the forces that were in Jeruſalem to follow after him, and in this array iſſued he after Siba. Now when he came unto Cabaon (a borough, ſome forty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem) Amaſa came and met with him, and brought with him great forces. Joab having
E his ſword girt by his ſide, and his cuirets on his back, whileſt Amaſa came onward to ſalute him, ſubtilly and of ſet purpoſe let his ſword ſlip out of his ſheath, and taking it up from the ground with one hand, he drew near unto Amaſa, under pretence to kiſſe him on the chin, and ſuddenly thruſt the ſword that was in his other hand into his belly and ſlew him. Which action of his was both hainous and deteſtable, proceeding from a jealouſie he had conceived againſt a good young man and his couſin, who had in no ſort offended him, and onely by reaſon of the eſtate of Generall, which the king had given him; and becauſe David had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cauſe before that he had ſlain Abner. Notwithſtanding this act of his ſeemed in ſome ſort pardonable, by reaſon of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done unto his brother Azael, yet was not this a ſufficient colour
F to excuſe the murther of Amaſa. When this was done, he purſued Siba, and left a certain man to wait upon the body of Amaſa, who had commandement given him to proclaime with a loud voyce thorow the whole army, that he was juſtly and deſervedly ſlain, commanding thoſe that bare any favour to the kings title, to follow their Generall Joab and his brother Abiſai. Now whileſt his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is uſuall in ſuch like accidents) flocked round about it, he that had the charge of the body took it up, and bare it into a certain place out of the way, and covered it with a garment: which done, all the people followed Joab.

Now whileſt he purſued Siba thorow all the region of the Iſraelites, a certain man told him that he had retired himſelf into a certain ſtrong city called Abelmacha; where he no ſooner arrived, but that he begirt the city, and entrenched it round about; commanding his soul- G diers to undermine and overthrow the walls: for he was sore displeased because they had shut the gates against him. But a certain honest, and prudent woman, seeing her countrey in extreme perill, ascended the walls and called Joab and his souldiers to a parlee; who comming forth to confer with him, she spake after this manner: God (said she) ordained Kings and Generalls of armies, to the end they might destroy the enemies of the Hebrews, and plant amongst them an universall and perpetual peace: but you enforce your selves to destroy one of the mother cities of Israel, and that hath in no sort offended you. Joab prayed God to be favourable unto them, and said that for his own part it was not his meaning that any one of the city should die, neither his pretence to raze and deface so famous a city; his intent was onely, that if Siba the son of Bochri, and the Kings adversary was delivered into his hands, to H doe justice on him, he would levy the siege, and cause his army to retire from thence. When the woman had heard what Ioab had said, she prayed him to stay a little while, promising him incontinently to cast his head over unto him. Whereupon she came down amongst the assembly of the citizens, to whom she spake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miserably suffer your wives and children to be slain for a wicked mans cause, and a stranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of David your king, from whose hands you have received so many benefits? think you that one onely city can resist so huge an army? After this manner perswaded she them to cut off Sibaes head, and to cast it into Ioabs camp: which done, Ioab commanded the retreat to be sounded, and levied the siege, and returning back into Jerusalem, was once more declared Generall of all the people. The King also appointed Benaja Captain of his guards, and of six hundreth souldiers. Adoram I was made Treasurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achilaus had the charge of remembrances. Susa was made Secretary. Sadoc and Abiather were made the high Priests. After this it hapned that the countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cause David besought God that he would have compassion on his people, and that it might please him to manifest not onely the cause, but also the remedy of that malady. The Prophets answered him, that God would be revenged of the wrong done to the Gabeonites whom King Saul had deceived and traiterously slain, without respect of the oath, which the Governour Josuah & the elders made unto them. If therefore he would suffer the Gabeonites to revenge the death of their slaughtered friends according to their desire, God had promised to be appeased, and to deliver the people from their eminent and present evills. As soon as K he understood by the Prophets what God required, he sent for the Gabeonites, and asked them what it was which they required: who wished him to deliver into their hands seven of Sauls sonnes to take their revenge on them: whereupon the King made search after them, onely sparing and protecting Mephibosheth the sonne of Jonathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold of these seven, they executed them according to their pleasures: and thereupon God incontinently sent down raine and disposed the earth to bear fruit, moistning and allaying the drouth forepassed, so that the land of the Hebrews recovered again his pristine fruitfulnesse. Not long after, the King made warre upon the Philistines: and at such time as the battell was stricken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chanced that the King hotly pursuing the chase was left alone, and discovered in his wearinesse by one of the enemies called Acmon, the sonne of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beside his sword had a Javelin the point whereof weighed three hundreth sicles, and a corselet tissued with chaines, who returning back charged David very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reason that he saw him spent with travell. But about the same instant, Abisai, Joabs brother, arrived in the place, who stept between them and preserved the King, and slew his enemy. The whole army for a little space were grievously discomforted, in regard of the danger wherein the King had been, and the Governours swore that he should never afterwards enter into battell with them, for fear left he might fall into some disaster, by reason of his readinesse and valour and by that means should deprive the people of those gifts which were in him, which he had M already made them feel; and whereof hereafter they should be made partakers, if God should vouchsafe him a long and blessed life. The King having intelligence that the Philistines were assembled in the city of Gazara, sent out an army against them, in which Sabath the Hittite, one of Davids redoubted and picked souldiers, behaved himself very valiantly, and gat great reputation: for he slew divers of them that vaunted themselves to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed up with presumption of their valour, and was chiefe authour of that victory which the Hebrews had.

After this last received losse, the Philistines once more hazarded their fortunes in warre against

A againſt whom when David had ſent out an army, Nephanus his kinſman ſhewed himſelfe very valiant: For fighting hand to hand againſt him that was accounted the moſt valiant Champion amongſt all the Philiſtines, he ſlew him, and put the reſt to flight; of whom very many died in the battell alſo. In proceſſe of time they re-incamped neer unto a City not far from the frontiers of the countrey of the Hebrews: In which army of theirs there was a man ſixe cubits high, who had on either foot and either hand, a finger more then accuſtomed bequeſt of nature affoorded him. Againſt whom Ionathan the ſonne of Sama (one of thoſe that were ſent by David in this army) fought hand to hand and ſlew him: ſo that approving himſelfe to be the means of that victory, he bare away the honour of the battell, and praiſe

B of his valour: for this Philiſtine boaſted likewiſe that he was deſcended of the race of the Gyants. After this battell they warred no more on the Iſraelites. Hereupon David, delivered from warre and danger, and ever after enjoying a perfect peace, compoſed Odes and Hymnes in praiſe of God, in divers kinds of verſe: for ſome are of three, otherſome are of five meaſures. He made inſtruments alſo, and taught the Levites to praiſe God upon them, on the Sabbath daies and other feaſts. The forme of theſe inſtruments was after this manner. The Cinnare is compoſed of ten ſtrings, and is plaid upon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelve ſounds of cords, and is ſtricken with the fingers. The Cymbals were large and great, and made of braſſe, of which it ſufficeth in this ſort to make ſome mention, leſt the nature of thoſe inſtruments ſhould wholly be unknown. Now all thoſe that were about the King were valiant men: but amongſt all the reſt, there were 38. moſt notable and he-

C roicke men. The noble actions of five of which I will declare, becauſe they might ſuffice to exemplifie the vertues that were in the other that remained: for they were capable to govern a countrey, and to conquer divers nations. The firſt of them was Eſſemus the ſon of Achemans, who having very oftentimes thruſt himſelfe into the midſt of his diſordered enemies, never gave over fighting till he had ſlain nine hundreth of them. After him was Eleazar the ſon of Dodeias, who had accompanied the King in Sarphat. He in a certain battell (whereon through the huge multitude of the enemies, the Iſraelites were affrighted and put to flight) onely kept his place and affronted the enemy, and ruſhing in among them made a great ſlaughter of them, ſo that thorow the great quantity of bloud which he ſhed, his ſword ſtuck faſt to his hand; and the Iſraelites ſeeing the Philiſtines put to flight by him, came

D down and ran upon them, and obtained a marvellous and great victory over them. For Eleazar ſlaughtered thoſe that fled, and the reſt of the army followed and ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain. The third was the ſon of Ilus called Sebas, who fighting againſt the Philiſtines, in a place called the Jaw (and ſeing the Hebrews to be affraid of their power, and almoſt out of heart) reſiſted them alone, as if he had been an arraunged army, and ſlew ſome of them, and purſued and put the reſt to flight, in that they were unable to ſuſtaine his force and violence. Theſe three exploited with their own hands theſe executions of war. About that time that the King lived in Jeruſalem, the army of the Philiſtines came out to make war upon him, and David (as we have declared heretofore) was gone up into the higher citie to aske counſell of God, what the event of that war ſhould be; and the enemies being incamped in that valley

E (that extendeth it ſelfe as far as Bethleem, a City ſome twenty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem) David ſaid to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was borne, and eſpecially that which is in the pit which is neer unto the gate, if any one will bring me of that water to drink, I ſhall eſteeme it more then if he gave me great riches. Theſe three men hearing theſe words, inſtantly ran out, and paſt thorow the enemies camp, and went to Bethleem: where having drawn water, they returned back unto the King, ſallying thorow the midſt of their enemies, bringing news that the Philiſtines being affraid of their hardineſſe, and great courage, kept themſelves upon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithſtanding their ſmall number. But the King taſted not of this water which they brought him, ſaying that it was bought with the danger of mens lives, and therefore that it

F was no reaſon that he ſhould drink thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation unto God, giving him thanks becauſe he had delivered his ſervants; After theſe three followed Abiſai Ioas brother, who ſlew ſixe hundreth of the enemies in one day. The fifth was Banaja of the race of the Levites, who being defied by certain brothers, famous amongſt the Moabites for their vertue, overcame them. Moreover, a certaine Egyptian of a wonderfull ſtature, having defied him (notwithſtanding the ſaid Banaja was naked and the other armed) yet charged he him, and tooke away his javelin and ſlew him. To theſe foreſaid acts of his, a man may annexe this as the moſt valiant, or very neerely equalling the reſt. For it came to paſſe, that after a certain ſnow, a Lion toſſing amidſt the flakes thereof, fell into a pit (whoſe mouth was ſo narrow, that a man could not diſcerne where it was,

The thirty three other were of like valour and vertue. But King David being desirous to know how many thousands of men he could number amongst the people, and forgetting the commandement ordained by Moses (who had given order that if the people had beene numbred, there should be paid unto God for every head halfe a sicle) he commanded Ioab to goe and number all the people: and although Ioab had manifestly proved unto him that it was a thing no wayes necessary; yet could he not perswade him, but that he enjoyned him with all expedition, to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrews.

v.20. Banaja slew a Lion. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. 2 Sam 24.1, ad 10.

David sendeth Joab to muster the people.

Hereupon Ioab took with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuited all the countrey of the Hebrews, to know how many men there were: and at the end of nine moneths and twenty daies, he returned to Jerusalem to the King; and presented him with the list of the people, the tribe of Benjamin onely excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Levi.) This done, the King perceiving that he had displeased God, was very sorrowfull and pensive. The rout of the other Israelites was of 900. thousand men able to beare arms, and to follow the warre, besides that the onely tribe of Iuda contained 400. thousand men. When the Prophets had certified David how God was displeased with him, he began to pray and beseech him that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad unto him, who brought him the choice of three things, willing him to make election which of the three he would endure: either that famine for seven yeers space should raigne in his countries; or that warre for three moneths space should afflict the same, wherein he should have the worst; or that the plague and pestilence should for three dayes space range amongst the Hebrews. Being thus distraught and troubled by reason of his difficult election, amidst these imminent miseries; and the Prophet urging him to return a short answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the King bethinking him that if he should aske famine, he should rather seeme to respect his own securitie, then the Common-weale, in that no danger might by that means touch him, for that he had great store of corn in his barn, and they unfurnished; and if for three moneths he should make choice to be overcome by the enemie, in that case also he might seeme to have care of himselfe, in that he had many strong Castles and a valiant guard of men to attend his person: he therefore made choice of a plague, that was both as incident to the Prince, as the subject; wherein each man was touched with equall and eminent feare: saying, that it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his enemies. When the Prophet had received this answer from him, he reported it unto God; who sent a plague and mortalitie amongst the Hebrews, whereby they died after divers manners: so that it was very hard to discerne the maladie; which being but one kinde, yet notwithstanding seized the people by ten thousand causes, and unknown occasions. For one of them died after another, and the sickneſſe surprizing them at unawares, brought a sudden dissolution of the spirits, and swouning upon them; so that some of them gave up the ghost with grievous torments, and most strange dolors. Others were presently parched up through the burning agonies they endured, and (unrecoverable by any counsell or remedy) consumed away amidst their languishing fits and tortures. Others died strangled, having their eies suddenly darkned and blinded. Othersome giving order for the buriall of their household servants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day-break (at which time the pestilent mortalitie began to rage) untill dinner time, there died seventy thousand persons. And now had the Angel of God stretched out his hand over Jerusalem, ready to inflict punishment thereon, when as the King put on sackcloth and prostrated himselfe on the ground, beseeching and praying God that it would please him to surcease his wrath, and be pacified with the number of those that were already consumed by the pestilence. Whilest thus he prayed, lifting up his eyes, he beheld the Angel of God hovering in the ayre over Jerusalem, with his naked sword: whereupon he besought God, and said, that it was he that was the shepheard, who had deserved to be punished, and not his flock; who ought to be favoured in that they had not any wayes offended, praying him to satisfie his displeasure upon him and his posteritie, and to spare the people.

v.18. A commandement to build an altar.

Which

A Which when David understood, he neglected not this Ordinance, but went presently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threshed his corn) saw the King accompanied by his sons coming towards him, he ran out to meet him, and humbled himself before him. This man was by nation a Jebusite, and one of the greatest friends that David had (by means whereof he left them unspoyled at such time as the fortress of the Jebusites was taken, as we have heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cause his Lord came thus unto him, who was his servant? David answered him, that it was to this intent that he might purchase his threshing floore, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer sacrifice unto God. Oronna replied, that both his floor, Chariots, and Oxen were the Kings to offer up for a burnt sacrifice, beseeching God that he would graciously accept that B offering. To this the King answered, that he highly esteemed his simplicity and magnanimitie, and that he favourably respected the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleasure that he should receive the price of the same, because he held it inconvenient to offer sacrifice unto God upon other mens charges. To this Oronna answered, that his Majestie might do as best pleased him. Hereupon he bought the foresaid floor of him for fifty sicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place and offered sacrifice thereon, as well burnt offerings as other sacrifices for prosperitie: and by this means the Divine Majesty was appeased, and ever after shewed himself favourable. (Now this place was the very same, whereto Abraham in times past had brought his sonne Isaac to offer up for a burnt sacrifice unto God, and as he was about to sacrifice him, a Wether upon the instant presented it self unto the C Altar, which Abraham offered up in stead of his sonne as we have heretofore made manifest.) David seeing that God had heard his prayer, and favourably accepted his sacrifice, decreed that in that place the generall Altar of the people should stand, and that on the very same floore he would build a Temple unto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified. For sending his Prophet unto him, he certified him that his sonne that should succeed him, should build a Temple. After this Propheticall delaration, the King commanded to number the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and it was found that there were one hundreth and foure-score thousand men: of which number he appointed eighty thousand to intend the hewing of stones; and ordered that the rest of the common people should bear stones unto them: and he appointed three thousand and five hundreth, who should govern them, and have the D overseeing of the works. He gathered also a great quantitie of Iron and Brasse, to work upon, with store of huge and mightie Cedar trees which they of Tyre and Sidon sent him, whom he had put in trust to furnish him therewith; telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his son should fortune to govern after him, he might have stuffe in a readinesse for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet young and unexperimented, should not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but having all things in a readiness, might finish the building of the Temple.

CHAP. XI.

E David during his life time, surrendreth the Kingdome to Solomon.

THen calling unto him his sonne Solomon, he charged him that after his decease, and his instalment in the Kingdome, he should build a Temple unto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to perform the same; yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had been soyled with slaughters, and brought up in warre. Adding further, that it was fore-prophesied unto him, that the finishing of that edifice was by Gods ordinance reserved to his younger sonne that should be called Solomon, whom God should not less tender and care for, then the father doth his sonne: and F how the whole land of the Hebrewes should be made happy under this Prince; and among all other benefits, that they should have peace (which is an especiall prerogative and blessing) and not onely be freed from forraign warres, but also from civill dissentions. For which cause (said he) since by God thou wert appointed King before thou wast born, indeavour thy self to be capable and worthy to be conducted by his Providence, by honouring piety, justice and fortitude, and keeping those his Ordinances and Laws, which he gave us by Moses, and not permitting others to transgresse the same. And as touching the Temple (which he will that thou shalt build when thou shalt obtain the kingdom) enforce thy self to discharge that duty towards God: neither be thou dismaid or afraid at the greatness of the work. Moreover he charged him to place the Ark within the Temple at ſuch time as it ſhould be finiſhed, with all other ſacred utenſils, for the receit whereof the Temple ſhould long ſince have been builded, had not their forefathers neglected Gods command, who had enjoyned them, that at ſuch time as they ſhould poſſeſs their enemies land, they ſhould build him a Temple. The fourth ſon of David was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias the ſon of Aegiſtha, (who reſembling Abſalon in complexion and ambition) began to uſurp, with a deliberation to make himſelf king: and amongſt his ordinary diſcourſes which he uſed to his friends, he ſaid, that it behoved him to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdome. To this intent he prepared many Chariots and Horſes, and fifty men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of theſe his proceedings, reproved him not, neither croſſed this his deliberation; neither demanded of him likewiſe, wherefore he preſumed to attempt ſuch unſeemly actions. Of this his revolt he had for his coadjutors Joab the General, and the high Prieſt Abiathar: but they that contradicted him, were the high Prieſt Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaja the Captain of the Guard, with Simei, Davids friend: beſides all other the valiant men at arms. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the Citie, and in the ſuburbs near unto the fountain of the Park royal, he invited all his brethren unto the ſame, except Solomon; and took with him Joab and Abiathar, with the Governours of the Tribe of Juda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Banaja, and the reſt of the contrary party, he called them not unto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethſabe, Solomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King without the knowledge of David, adviſing her both to have care of her own ſecuritie, and the eſtate and majeſtie of her ſonne (who by reaſon of Adonias uſurpation was like to be ſupplanted) wiſhing her in perſon to certifie the King thereof: and further promiſing, that while ſhe debated these things with the King, he would come in the mean while and confirm that which he had ſaid. Bethſabe being thus perſwaded by Nathan, came unto the King, and humbling her ſelf before him (and afterwards requiring licence to ſpeak unto him) ſhe certified him of all thoſe things that had hapned, according as ſhe had been adviſed by the Prophet: particularly deciphering unto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what gueſts he had invited, (namely, Abiathar and Joab, with the reſt of his ſonnes, except Solomon and his particular friends) urging this furthermore, that the people expected who it ſhould be, whom David would nominate to ſucceed him: for which cauſe ſhe earneſtly beſought David, that he would provide and foreſee, that he who ſhould ſucceed him in the government, ſhould neither ſeek her blood, nor the death of her ſonne Solomon. Whileſt Bethſabe diſcourſed after this manner, the Chamberlaines gave the King to underſtand that Nathan attended to ſpeak with him. Whereupon David commanded that he ſhould be called in, and as ſoon as he was entered, he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to govern and ſucceeded in the kingdome after him: for that (ſaid he) he hath made a ſumptuous feaſt; whereunto he hath invited all thy ſonnes, but Solomon; thither alſo hath he called Joab: where after the great cheer and banquetting, they have proclaimed and cried, Long live King Adonias. As ſoon as Nathan had made an end of his ſpeech, David commanded that Bethſabe ſhould be called in (who had retired her ſelf out of the Kings chamber, at ſuch time as the Prophet entred into the ſame.) As ſoon as Bethſabe re-entred the chamber, David ſaid unto her, I ſwear unto thee by that great God, that thy ſonne Solomon ſhall reigne after me, according as before this time I have already ſworn unto thee, and he it is that ſhall ſit upon my throne, yea even this preſent day. Upon theſe words, Bethſabe humbled herſelf, and beſought God to grant the King long life. But as touching Solomon, he gave him inſtructions how he ought to behave himſelf with pietie and juſtice, in the government of all the people of the Hebrews, and of the Tribe of Iuda. After this, Banaia beſought God that it would pleaſe him to be favourable unto Solomon, and

So that Adonias and they that banqueted with him, hearing the noiſe, were all of them ſore troubled, and Ioab in particular ſaid, that thoſe tunes and trumpetings did no waies content him.

Whileſt thus they ſate at the banquet, and every man through amaze forbore to eat his D meat (being diſtracted through varietie of thoughts) Ionathan the ſonne of Abiather came haſtily in amongſt them. This yong man did Adonias moſt willingly behold, and ſaid that he was a meſſenger of ſome glad tydings: but contrariwiſe he recited unto them all that which had befallen Solomon, or had been decreed by David. Whereupon, Adonias and all his gueſts forſook the banquet, and ſuddenly fled every man unto his own houſe. But Adonias fearing the Kings diſpleaſure (by reaſon of his ambition and arrogancy) ranne unto the Aitar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a ſuppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reaſon had cauſe to do.

Now when theſe tidings were brought unto Solomon, and what he had done, and how he required that Solomon would aſſure him, that he would never more call to memory that E which had hapned, but pardon his offence: Solomon anſwered him graciouſly and moderately, and pardoned him that fault; notwithſtanding, with this caution, that if hereafter it ſhould appear that he intended or acted any rebellion, it ſhould be Adonias himſelf, who ſhould be the author of his miſchief: with this anſwer he ſent ſome to deliver him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Solomons preſence and had ſaluted him, he was commanded to repair home unto his houſe, without ſuſpect of any inconvenience: yet by the way was he admoniſhed to behave himſelf uprightly for the time to come, if in any ſort he either reſpected his credit or profit.

1 Chro. 23. 3, 4. David numbreth the Levites, and diſtributeth their offices.

But David willing that his ſonne ſhould be accepted for their known and anointed King among the people, aſſembled the governours in Jeruſalem, with the Prieſts and Levites; and F firſt of all taking the number of them, he found thirty three thouſand men that were above thirtie three yeers old; 23000. of which, he appointed to take charge of the building of the Temple, ſix thouſand to be Judges and Scribes, with the like number of Muſicians to play upon inſtruments, who were furniſhed by David (as we have heretofore declared) and diſtributed by him according to their families. So that ſeparating the Prieſts from the reſt of their Tribe, he found four and twenty families of them; ſixteen of the houſe of Eleazar, and eight of the houſe of Ithamar, giving order that one onely familie ſhould for the ſpace of eight dayes perform Gods ſervice. And thus were all the families diſtributed by lot in the preſence of David, of the high Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, and of the Governours. The firſt familie that aſcended the Temple was written firſt, the ſecond next, and ſo ſucceſſively the rest to the number of four and twenty (and this law remaineth in the same sort even unto this day.) He made also twenty and four divisions of the Tribe of Levi (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as did the Priests, every eight day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posteritie: for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasure, and of those presents which the Kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Levites as Priests) should serve God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole armie into twelve companies, with their Governours, Centurions, and Conductors: every squadron contained four and twenty thousand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the space of thirty dayes (continuing from the first unto the last, with their Captains over thousands, and Centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authoritie over every squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surveiors, who should have the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were unnecessarie to declare.) After that every one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Governours of the Hebrews (and in generall, all those that had any commission over the affairs or demains of the Kings) to a generall assembly, and seating himself in a high erected throne, he spake after this manner: My brethren and countreymen, I am desirous that you should know, that having determined with my self to build a Temple unto God, I have made provision of a great quantitie of gold and silver, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Prophet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my hand hath been soiled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne (who shall succeed me in my Kingdome) shall erect a Temple unto him.

Now therefore, sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelve sonnes of Iacob, Iuda, by the generall consent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my six brethren have been preferred and placed by God in the Kingdome, and notwithstanding no one of them supposeth himself to be injured: so do I also request, that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my other sonnes, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselves, nouriſh any unnaturall hatreds and seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God, they may willingly subject themselves to his dominion. For whereas if God so pleaseth, it is not to be misliked to submit your selves to forrain subjection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate and favour your brother no otherwise, then if you were partakers of the same honours with him? Truly, I desire nothing more then that Gods promises may be brought to effect, and that that felicitie which attendeth this region (under the government of Solomon) may presently be dispersed, and perpetually indure in this countrey. Which without doubt will so fall out; and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of piety and justice, and the ancient laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise, if these be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected but mortality and miserie. After he had finished these sayings, he gave his sonne the plot and module of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houses and chambers, together with the number, height and breadth of the same. He also limited the weight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of gold or of silver, exhorting him to employ all his care and diligence in performance of the same. He incouraged likewise the Governours and the Tribe of Levi to assist him, both for that his yeers had not as yet obtained their ripe maturity, as also for that by Gods divine providence he was admitted and elected King, and was appointed to build the Temple, assuring them that the building would be very easie, and no waies laborious; considering that he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and farre more of silver, and wood, besides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantitie likewise of Emeraulds, and other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the present he would bestow on them to that use, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out of his own treasury to adorn the holy place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that should stand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Governours, Priests and Levites according together, shewed a greater readinesse, and made many signall and heroicall offers. For they tied themselves to bring five thousand talents of gold, and ten thousand stateres, of silver a hundred thousand, and of iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious stone, he brought it and delivered it to the treasurers custody, who was called Ialus, being one of Moses posteritie This thing highly contented all the people, and David (seeing the affection and readinesse of the Governours and Priests, and in generall of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voice, calling him the Creator and Father of this-

He was ſufficient both in knowledge and foreſight, both how to accept of the preſent, and how to manage his future occaſions: he was moderate and juſt, courteous, and favourable to thoſe that were afflicted, and both juſt and gentle, which are thoſe ornaments wherewith Princes ought to be beautified: and in this great authority wherein he was placed, he ſtepped not any wayes awry, but in reſpect of Urias wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, then any other King of the Hebrews, or other Nations had done. His ſon Solomon buried him moſt royally in Jeruſalem,

Jerusalem, with all those ceremonies which were accustomed in royal obsequies, and amongst other things, he buried a great and huge value of riches with him: the incredible estimate whereof may be conjectured by that which followeth. For one thousand three hundred yeers after, the high Priest Hircanus being besieged by Antiochus surnamed the wicked (who was Demetrius son) and willing to gratifie him with some summe of money (to the intent he might levie the siege, and transport his Army some other wayes) and unable to levie money by any other means, he opened one Cabinet of the Monuments of David, from whence he drew three thousand talents, which he delivered to Antiochus, and by this means delivered the City from the siege (as we have declared in another place.) And again, a long time after this, Herod also opened another Cabinet, from whence he took out a great summe. And as touching the Tombes of Princes, no man defaced them, because they were most magnificently builded, for fear lest they should be esteemed destroyers of Monuments. But for the present it sufficeth that I have certified thus much.

The year of the world, 2931. before Christs Nativity, 1033.

1 King. 2. Solomon king of Israel after Davids death.

WE have declared in the former Book what David was, how great his vertue hath been, what profits and benefits those of his Nation received by him, what warres and battels he worthily exployted, and how happily at last (through extremity of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Solomon his son (being at that time very young) had obtained the kingdome, and was placed in his Fathers Throne (according as David had determined, and the Divine Power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common course in the Election of new Princes) with happy acclamations wished him perpetual felicitie in all his Affairs, and after his well governed estate and royaltie, long, many and prosperous yeers. But Adonias, who during his Fathers life time, thought to possesse and seize himself of the Royall estate, came unto the Kings Mother, and with all humilitie and reverence saluted her. To whom Bethsebae said, that if there were any thing wherein she

A she might stead him, he should manifest it unto her, and that she would grant it him willingly. Whereupon he began to say, that it was a thing very well known, that the kingdom appertained unto him, both in regard of his age, as also in respect of the favour and good liking of the people: but since that it had been transfered unto Solomon her son by the will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his servant, being very glad of the fortunate successe of his affairs. He therefore besought her that she would sollicite Solomon in his behalf, and perswade him to give him Abisace to wife, who had slept with David, for that he had not any carnal company with her by reason of his age, and that as yet she was fully possessed of her virginity.

v. 17. ad 24. Adonias requireth Abisace to wife.

Bethsabe promised him to further his suit to the utmost of her power, and willingly to imploy her self toward the accomplishing of the marriage, both for that the King was willB ling to gratifie her in whatsoever she should desire, as also for that she would instantly intreat him: so that he departed from her with assured hope of good successe in respect of his marriage. Hereupon presently did Bethsabe addresse herself to the King, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requested, and what she had granted. When tydings came to Solomon that his mother came to visit him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the royal treasure was, he sate him down, and commanded his servants to place a seat on his right hand, for his mother: who settled by him, spake unto him after this manner: My son, vouchsafe me one favour that I shall request at thy hands, and send me not hence discontented, and confused through thy refusal. Solomon answered her, that she should command him, by reason that duty tied him to the C satisfaction and favour of his mothers suits, reproving her for that insinuation she had used, by reason that thereby she evidently expressed that she was not thorowly assured to obtain her demand; but that she feared the refusal and repulse in the same: she therefore required him to give the damosel Abisce for wife to Adonias his brother. The King displeased at this her suit, dismissed his mother, alledging that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, and that he wondred that in requiring Abisace to wife, he had not requested Solomon likewise to give him place in the Kingdome: for Adonias was elder then he, and had more mighty friends then he had; namely, the General Joab, and the high Priest Abiathar. For which cause he incontinently sent Banaia captain of his guard to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling unto him the high Priest Abiathar: The pains (said he) that thou hast indured by accompanying my father David, and attending and bearing the Ark with him, make thee D escape from death: yet notwithstanding, for that thou hast been assistant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I condemne thee to depart from my presence, charging thee not to see my face any more, but to retire thy self to thine own house, and there to live in thy countrey untill thou hast ended thy dayes: for having in this sort neglected me, it is not convenient that thou shouldest be in honour with me. For this cause was the house of Ithamar deprived of the Priestly dignity (according as God had fore-prophecied to Eli, one of the ancestors of Abiathar) and translated to the race of Phinees, and established in Sadoc. Those of the race of Phinees, who led a private life all that time that the Priesthood remained in the family of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the first) were these; Boccias the sonne of Joseph, E Joathan the sonne of Boccias, Maraoth the sonne of Joatham, Aropha the sonne of Maraoth, Achitob the sonne of Aropha, Sadoc the sonne of Achitob, who was the first high Priest under King David.

v. 25. Adonias is slain.

v. 26, 27. Abiathar is dispossessed of the Priesthood.

v. 35. The genealogie of the high Priest Sadoc.

Joab having tydings of the death of Adonias, was seized with sudden and extreme fear: for he loved him more then King Solomon, and by reason of that friendship which he bare unto him, he justly and upon good grounds apprehended his own danger, and in this respect he fled unto the Altar, hoping in that place to be secured in regard of that reverence which the King bare unto God. But when Joabs resolution was made known unto the king, he sent Banaia unto him with commission to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the judgement seat, that he might in that place justifie his actions: But Joab said that he F would never abandon the Temple, but that he had rather die in that place then in another. When Banaia had certified the King of this his answer, he commanded him to cut off his head in the same place, according as he required, and that in that sort he should be punished by reason of the two murthers, which he had cursedly committed upon the persons of Abner and Amasa: commanding that his body should be buried in the same place, to the end that his sins should never depart from his race, and that both David and Solomon might be held guiltlesse of the death of Joab. This command of his Banaia executed, and was afterward made General of the men of war. Moreover, the King established Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simei also to build him an house in Jeruſalem, to keep himſelf therein, without paſſing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to break that commandment, the penaltie which he ſhould incurre, ſhould be no leſſe then death; and to the more ſerious performance of this his injunction, he tied him by a ſolemne oath. Simei thanked Solomon for the charge he had impoſed on him, and ſwore that he would fulfill the ſame: ſo that forſaking his own countrey, he came and dwelt in Jeruſalem, where after he had ſojourned for the ſpace of three years, it happened that he had newes that two of his fugitive ſlaves had fled, and retired themſelves into Geth: whereupon he went to find them out, and no ſooner returned he back again with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandment; and that which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made unto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cauſe calling him unto him, he ſpake after this manner; Haſt thou not ſworn (ſaid he) that thou wilt no wayes abandon or iſſue out of this City to depart into another? Truly thou ſhalt not eſcape the penaltie of thy perjury, but I will ſee juſtice done upon thee for the ſame, and for thoſe outrages thou didſt offer unto my father during his flight, at which time thou didſt ſhew thy ſelf to be a wicked man in all things: to the end that thou mayeſt underſtand that the wicked receive no priviledge, although that their puniſhments be for the preſent deferred, but at ſuch time as they ſuppoſe themſelves to be aſſured (becauſe they have ſuffered no puniſhment) their puniſhment is augmented and made more grievous, then it had been, if they had preſently been executed for their offences. Whereupon Banaja ſlew Simei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward Solomon had his royall eſtate ſecured, and after that his enemies had received condigne puniſhment, he took to wife the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Jeruſalem, far greater and more ſtronger then they were before: and all the reſt of his life, he governed his Common-weal in peace; ſo that his youthfull years hindred him not from the obſervation of juſtice, and the maintenance of laws, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the hour of his death: but behaving himſelf in all things exactly, he executed the affairs of his kingdome with that circumſpection, that ſuch as excelled him in years, and were advanced in prudence, could not ſurpaſſe him.

Of the wiſedome, prudence, and riches of Solomon, and how firſt of all he builded the Temple in Jeruſalem.

v. 5. ad 8. God appeareth to Solomon by night in a dream and willeth him to aſk that which moſt of all he deſired.

v. 9, ad 15. Solomon requireth wiſedome at Gods hands, who with it giveth him riches and honours alſo.

AS ſoon as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vows unto God, on that brazen Altar which was erected by Moſes, and ſacrificed thereon in burnt offerings a thouſand head of cattel; which honourable devotion of his was moſt acceptable unto God. For the very ſame night, after he had appeared unto him in a dream, he commanded him to aſk whatſoever bleſſing (as he imagined) ſufficient to recompence this his pietie. But Solomon required a moſt high and excellent thing, which God doth moſt liberally beſtow, and men in like ſort very happily receive. For he demanded neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other kind of riches (ſuch as a youthfull man would require) for theſe are onely affected by the common ſort, when the other are onely worthy of the divine magnificence: but give me (ſaid he) O Lord, a ripe judgement, and a good underſtanding, to the intent that by theſe means, I may adminiſter juſtice to this people with truth and equity. With this demand of his, God was greatly delighted, and promiſed him to give him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glory, and above all theſe, ſuch an underſtanding and wiſdome, as no one man either King or private hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the Kingdome in his family for many ages, if ſo be that he continued in the wayes of juſtice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers wayes in imitating his chiefeſt vertues.

After that Solomon had received theſe bleſſings from God, aud was made happy by theſe promiſes, he forſook his bed, and worſhipping God returned unto Jeruſalem, where he offered great ſacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnifically feaſted all thoſe of his houſhold. About the ſame time a very difficult judgement was brought him to decide, the reſolution whereof, was very hard to be diſcovered. And I have thought it neceſſary to declare the occaſions whereon at that preſent the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may underſtand the difficulty of the cauſe in queſtion; and that if they happen at any time to be aſſiſtant in ſuch like affairs, they might draw as it were from the counterfeit of this

A this Kings wiſedome, a perfect module, whereby they may directly ſhape and anſwer to ſuch demands as ſhall be offered them. Two women of looſe and luſtful converſation came unto him, one of the which (who ſeemed to have ſuffered the injury) began after this manner: The year of the world, 2931. before chriſts Nativitie, 1033

Two women accuſe one another, for exchange of their children.

I, O King (ſaid ſhe) and this woman dwell together in one chamber; but ſo it fortuned, that both of us on one day, and at the ſame houre, bare each of us a ſonne: ſome three dayes after we were brought abed, this woman lying by her infant, hath in ſleep overlaid it, and ſtifled it, and hath taken my child from between my knees and laid it by her, and ſettled the dead childe, whileſt I ſlept, in my boſome. Now on the morrow, when I thought to offer the teat unto mine infant, I found not mine own, but perceived that her childe lay dead by me: for I knew it, becauſe I had exactly marked it. This my childe I have demanded at her hands, and becauſe I could not re-

B cover it, I have made my recourſe unto your Majeſties juſtice, O King: for in that we are ſole women, and ſhe is obſtinate, and feareth not to be convicted by any, ſhe perſiſteth in her obſtinate deniall of the ſame. à v. 16. ad finem.

After the King had heard this her demand, he inquired of the other if ſhe had any thing to anſwer to this accuſation. But ſhe denying the act, and averring that the childe which remained alive, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and beſides that, ſince no man appeared that might determine the controverſie, but all the aſſiſtants were amazed at the obſcuritie and difficultie of the debate; the King at laſt bethought him of this policy: He commanded that both the children ſhould be brought before his preſence, as well the living as the dead; and calling one of his Guard unto him, he commanded him v. 24. 25. Solomon commandeth both the children to be divided into two parts.

C with his naked ſword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the half of the living, and the other, half of the dead childe. This ſentence of his was ſecretly condemned by all the people, accounting it very childiſh. In the mean time the true mother began to exclaim, and deſire that the matter might not paſs ſo farre, but rather that they ſhould give the whole childe, that was alive, unto the other: for that it ſufficed her, ſo as ſhe might ſee him alive, though he might be ſuppoſed to be anothers. The adverſe part offered her ſelf to behold the diviſion of the infant: and moreover required that the true mother ſhould be puniſhed. But the King conjecturing by the diſcourſe, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was moſt unfained: adjudged the infant unto her that cried firſt (for that in equitie ſhe was the true mother) and con- v. 27. Solomon by the ſpeech and geſture of the women diſcovereth the true mother.

D demned the wickedneſs of the other, who had murthered her own childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people took this judgement for an aſſured proof and ſign of the Kings prudence and wiſedome; and from that time forwards, they reſpected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a Divine Spirit. The chieftains and governors under him thorow all the kingdome, were theſe: Uri governed the countrey of Ephraim, wherein was compriſed the rule of Bethlehem. Aminadab commanded over the quarter of Dura, and the Sea coaſt, and had eſpouſed the daughter of Solomon. The great Plain was ſubjected to Banaia the ſon of Achila, who governed likewiſe all the Countrey that extended towards Jordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulonites, as farre as the mountain Libanus, and had under him ſixtie Solomons governours and captains. 1 Reg. 4. 1. ad 21.

E great Cities, and Forts. Achinadab governed all Galilee as far as Sadon, and had eſpouſed alſo one of Solomons daughters called Baſima: Banacat had the countrey that confineth the Sea neer to the Citie of Arce: Saphat, the mountains Itabyr, and Carmel, and the land of Galilee as far as Jordan: Sonbeia governed the whole land of the Benjamites: Tabar had all the government on the other ſide of Jordan, and was elected governour generall over them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrewes wonderfully increaſe in riches, and the Tribe of Juda waxed opulent, by reaſon that the people addicted themſelves wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was under ſuch aſſurance, that being diſtracted by no warlike tumults, and beſides that fruitfully enjoying a moſt deſired liberty, they eſ- The happie peace of the Iſraelites in Solomons time.

F pecially intended this thing onely, to increaſe their private and particular eſtates. The King alſo had other governours who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other ſtrange Nations, which are extended from Euphrates as farre as Egypt, who gathered the tribute of thoſe Nations for the King. Theſe Barbarians every day furniſhed the King for his own Table, and the maintenance of his houſhold, with thirty Cores of fine floure, and ſixtie of the courſer: ten fat Oxen, and twentie graſs beeves, with an hundred fat lambs. All which things, beſides veniſon and buffalles taken in chaſe, birds, and fiſh, were furniſhed dayly by the Barbarians to ſerve the Kings houſhold. He had likewiſe a great number of Chariots, ſo that he had fourtie thouſand mangers wherein his Coach-horſes fed; and beſides theſe he v. 23. Solomons daily expences.

had twelve thouſand horſemen, half whereof kept alwayes about the King in Jeruſalem, the reſt were billetted in divers villages belonging to the king, and remained there. And they that had the charge to furniſh the kings expences, provided likewiſe neceſſary provender for the horſes, conveying it to that place whereſoever the king ſojourned. But ſo great was the wiſedom and prudence which God had beſtowed upon Solomon, that he ſurpaſſed all his progenitors: and the Egyptians likewiſe, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt of all men, were far behind him in wit. For he excelled all thoſe that in that time were in the greateſt account amongſt the Hebrews, whoſe names I will not omit; and theſe they were Ethan, Eman, Chalt and Dodan the ſon of Imaon. He compoſed alſo 1500 Books of Odes and Canticles, and 3000. Books of Parables and Similitudes; for to every kind of Plant he alluded the parable from Hyſſope, unto the Cedar. The like did he of all living creatures that feed on the earth, ſwim in the waters, or flie in the aire; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to ſearch their faculties in particular, but examined and diſcourſed on them all, and had an inward ſpeculation and knowledge of their ſeverall and ſecret properties. He obtained alſo by inſpiration the Art of Magick, for the profit and health of men, and the exorciſing and caſting out of devils; for he deviſed certain incantations, whereby the diſeaſed are cured, and left the method of conjuration in writing, whereby the devils are enchanted and expelled; ſo that never more they dare return: And this kind of hea'ing to this day, is very uſual amongſt thoſe of our Nation. For I ſaw a certain popular and private man amongſt the Hebrews, in the preſence of Veſpaſian, his ſons, tribunes, and other ſouldiers, that cured divers that were poſſeſſed. And the manner of his cure was this: He applied to the noſe of the Demoniack a Ring; under the ſeal whereof, was a root of thoſe things that Solomon had declared, which drew the devil out of the noſtrils of the ſick, as ſoon as he ſmelled the root: and as ſoon as the man was falne, he adjured him never more to return, intermixing ſome mention of Solomon, and rehearſing thoſe incantations that were invented by him.

After this, the ſaid Eleazar being deſirous to ſhew unto them that were preſent, the efficacie of his Art, he ſet a pot or pitcher of water not farre from the place where the poſſeſſed ſtood, and commanded the devil at ſuch time as he forſook the man, to overturn the pot, and thereby to give a ſign unto the aſſiſtants, that he had forſaken the poſſeſſed: which act of his manifeſtly declareth how great the ſcience and wiſedome of Solomon was. For which cauſe I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy nature of this King might be known unto all men; and how beloved of God he was, and how ſurpaſſing in all kinds of vertue. When Hiram King of Tyre underſtood that Solomon ſucceeded his father in the kingdome, he was glad thereof, (for he was Davids friend) for which cauſe he ſent meſſengers unto him to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him: by whom Solomon returned an anſwer in theſe tearms:

1 *King.*5.1. ad 12. Hirams Embaſſadours to Solomon.

Solomon to Hiram the King: Know thou, that my father having a will to build a Temple unto God, hath been withdrawn from the performance thereof, by the continuall wars and troubles he hath had: for he never took reſt before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries unto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I poſſeſs, and for that by the means thereof, I have opportunitie (according to mine own deſire) to build a Temple unto God. for he it is that foretold my father that his houſe ſhould be builded during my reign. For which cauſe I pray you ſend ſome one of your skilfulleſt men with my ſervants to the wood Libanus, to hew down trees in that place: for the Macedonians are more skilfull in hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleavers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruſe the Contents of the ſame, and wrote back again unto him to this effect:

v. 6. Solomon requireth Carpenters and workmen from Hiram.

The King Hiram unto King Solomon: Thou haſt cauſe to thank God, in that he hath delivered thy fathers kingdome into thy hands, to thee I ſay, who art a man wiſe and full of vertue. For which cauſe ſince no news can come unto me more gracious, nor office of love, more eſteemed then this, I will accompliſh all that thou requeſteſt: for after I have cauſed a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut down, I will ſend it thee by ſea by my ſervants, whom I will command (and furniſh with convenient veſſels of burthen) to the end they may deliver the ſame, in what place of thy Kingdome it ſhall beſt pleaſe thee, that afterwards thy ſubjects may tranſport them to Jeruſalem. Thou ſhall provide to furniſh us with Corn, whereof we ſtand in need, becauſe we inhabite an Iſland.

v. 7. ad 10. Hiram promiſeth Solomon wood, and inſtead thereof requireth corn.

The Copies are yet at this day kept, not only by thoſe of that Nation, but alſo by the Tyrians: ſo that if any man deſire exactly to know what they be, let him ſearch the publick Records of the Tyrians, and he ſhall find in them matters accordant to that we have ſaid. All which I ſay, to the end the Readers might be aſſured, that I outſtrip not the truth in any ſort, and that I inſert not in this Hiſtory matters that are meerly apparant and deceitfull, and onely faſhioned for delight; neither fear I that any man ſhall examine my writings; neither

deſire

A desire I likewise that every man give credit at the first sight to the same, or that I be held blameless in suffering my self any wayes to vary or improperly dilate ought in this history: but contrariwise, if I cannot approve the truth by demonstration, and sufficient testimonies, I desire not to be allowed. As soon as Solomon had received these letters from the king of the Tyrians, he praised his facility and benevolence, and presently sent him that which he demanded: every year therefore he sent him two thousand Cores of wheat, and the like number of Bads of oyl (this Bad containeth seventy and two sextaries.) He gave him also the like measure of wine. From that time forward the friendship betwixt Hiram and Solomon increased more and more, so that both of them protested that it should continue for ever. The King imposed on his people the tribute of thirty thousand workmen, whom he gave in charge to travel continually, and distributed them very discreetly. He ordained that ten thou-
B sand of them should cut wood in Lebanus for the space of one moneth; and that then they should rest two moneths, returning every man unto his own dwelling place: until such time as the 20 thousand had in their turn accomplished the task in the time that was prefixed unto them, and then the first 10000 renued their work, and followed the same in the fourth moneth. Adoram was constituted superintendent over this tribute. Besides these, there were 70000 men appointed to carry stones and wood, who were the inhabitants of that countrey, which David had left. There were fourscore thousand hewers of stone, over which were 3200 commissaries; these had the King commanded to cut the greatest stones, to make the foundations of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountain, he
C commanded should be drawn and brought into the City, and not only commanded he his countrey-men to perform this, but those workmen also that were sent him by Hiram.

Solomon began this building in the fourth year of his reign, in the second moneth, which the Macedonians call Artemisium, and the Hebrews Jar; five hundred ninetie and two years after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, one thousand and twentie years, since the arrival of Abraham in Mesopotamia; one thousand four hundred and fourtie years, after the Deluge: And since Adam the first man until Solomon (who builded the Temple) all the years that are passed, have been three thousand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram, who governed in Tyre: and since the first time that Tyre began to be inhabited, until the said building of D the Temple, there passed two hundred and fourtie years. The King therefore laid the foundations of the Temple, & made a most deep trench, and fortified it with most strong stones, which might be able to resist all the injuries of time. These stones were so closely joyned the one unto the other, that for the strength of the foundations, they might serve to make the base and ground, both to fortifie the work, as also to sustain that which should be builded thereupon, either for embellishment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of less strength and hugeness, which were to sustaine a sumptuous pile of that height, greatness, magnificence and ornament. The walls were made of white stone, and continued of the same matter even until the roof. The height of the Temple was sixty cubits, and the length as much, and the breadth twenty. Over that was another edifice, having the like de-E mensions; so that the whole height of the Temple was fixscore cubits: and the entry thereof was to the East-ward. The porch that gave entry thereinto, had twenty cubits in length (which was the breadth of the Temple) and in breadth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of fixscore cubits. About the Temple was builded thirty Cels, which invironed the circuit of the same on the outside, and served to sustain all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and passible the one into the other. The entries were made after the same manner, from whence a man might easily pass from the one to the other. Every one of these Cels had twenty and five cubits in breadth, & as many in length, and twenty in height: and above them there were others builded: and others likewise above these of like number and dimension: so that they were almost as high as the other buildings. Over these there were no build-
F ings; only this, they were covered with Cedar: Every Cell had his cover apart, and had no dependence on the other roofs. The rest of the building of the Temple was covered with long beams, mortized the one within the other, which sustained the whole: so that the walls being in this manner fastned the one unto the other, were the more stronger. To these beams were there fastned certain roofs of the same stuff, which were curiously polished, carved and guilded. The walls on the inside were covered with Cedar plants intermixed with gold: so that all the Temple shined, and the burnisht gold lightned, and dazeled their eyes that entred into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was most artificially made of stones most exactly carved, and most closely and cunningly joyned together: so that they that curiously pried into the same, could not any wayes observe the stroke of any hammer, nor other workmans tool, but all the whole maſs ſeemed to be a natural and no artificial frame; and rather gathered in that place of it ſelf, then garniſhed by the hands of cunning workmen. As touching the aſcent into the higheſt part of the Temple, the King in that ſort deviſed it, that in the thickneſs of the wall he included a pair of winding ſtairs to that purpoſe. This part had not a great gate towards the Eaſtward, as the lower had, but in the ſides there were little doors made: All the whole Temple both within and without was covered with Cedar planks, tied together with ſtrong chains to fortifie and ſtrengthen the ſame. The Temple inwardly was divided into two parts, the one whereof contained the ſanctum ſanctorum, of twenty cubits (which was unacceſſible) the reſt of the ſpace of fourty cubits was conſecrated to the uſe of the Prieſts. And in the midſt of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, inriched with ſtore of gold, and divers curious carved works and hung them with tapeſtrie: wherein were embrodered divers flowers of hyacinth, purple, and ſcarlet entermingled with moſt pure, white, and delicate linen. He placed alſo upon the holy of holieſt (which was twenty cubits broad, and as many long) two Cherubins of maſſie gold, each one five cubits high, and each of them had two wings that were ſpread five cubits broad, by which means they were not far diſtant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wall of the ſacred place, and the other the Northern wall: the other wings that touched one another, ſerved for a cover for the Ark which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impoſſible to expreſs: he made the pavement of the Temple alſo, of plates of beaten gold. To the gate of the Temple he alſo faſtned convenient doors twenty cubits high, anſwerable in height to the wall, and covered with plates of gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garniſhed with gold: he likewiſe adorned the outſide of the gates as he had done the inſide. But the gate of the porch had no ſuch ornament. After this, Solomon ſent unto Hiram king of Tyre for one, who was a cunning workman called Uram, the ſon of a woman of the line of Neptbali; and of Urias the Iſraelite. This man had great knowledg in all kind of works, but his eſpecial excellency was in working gold, ſilver and braſs, who made all that which covered the Temple according as the King commanded. He made two pillars of braſs, four fingers thick, and eighteen cubits high, and twelve in the circumference, on the chapters of each of them, he planted a founded lilly, of five cubits in height, which he invironed with certain grates made of braſs after the manner of enterlaced nets which covered the lillies on each ſide, on which there hung down two hundred Pomegranats in two ranks. Theſe pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Jachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded alſo the brazen Sea made after the manner of a Hemiſphear, and this veſſel was called the Sea, by reaſon of the hugeneſs thereof. For it was a laver that by meaſured line was ten cubits broad, the thickneſs of a hand; the midſt therof was ſuſtained with a pillar ten times twiſted, whoſe bigneſs was a cubit. This laver was ſuſtained by 12 heifers, which by three and three were placed directly oppoſite againſt the quarters of the four winds: and the hindermoſt part of theſe heifers were ſet ſomewhat ſtooping, to the end that this round and ample veſſel might be the more ſurely ſupported by them. This ſea contained three thouſand Bads. He made alſo ten brazen baſes four ſquare, for the lavers, each one in length five cubits, in breadth four, in height three; thus were the parts of this work ſeverally faſhioned. There were four little pillars ſquare, and erected at every corner one, in which the ſides of the baſes were adjoyned, and divided into three ſorts, according to the place diſtinguiſhed between the joynts; with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle. The pillars likewiſe were adorned with the ſame ingraving: and all this whole work hung upon four wheels, which were made of caſt work, which had certain naves or ſpoaks a cubit and a half in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to ſee the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly ſetled to the ſides of the baſes by their naves, or ſtrakes. They were thus made: the corners or angles on the upper part were ſuſtained by certain ſhoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which was there placed a ſpire, to which the laver was faſtned, being upheld by the paws of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were faſhioned and ſo properly united, that they that beheld them, would have ſuppoſed them rather to be natural creatures then otherwiſe: and betwixt them alſo there were certain palm trees figured. Such was the compoſition of the ten lavers. Moreover, he made ten other brazen lavers after the manner of a round cockle ſhell, each of which contained fourty Choes: for they were in height four cubits, and from brim to brim, there were likewiſe four cubits: which lavers he placed upon ten baſes or feet called Meconoth, five of which ſtood on the left ſide of the Temple, that extended to the Northward, the other five on the right hand toward the Southward; yet ſo as they affron ed the Eaſt. Here likewiſe placed he the Sea full of water, to the intent that the

A Prieſts entring into the Temple, might waſh their hands and feet before they went up unto the Altar. The other lavers ſerved to waſh the inwards and feet of thoſe beaſts that were ſacrificed. He builded likewiſe a brazen Altar of twenty cubits long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewiſe all the veſſels that belonged thereunto of braſſe: as kettles, water-pots, hooks, and forks. and ſuch like, that in brightneſſe equalled the pure gold. The King alſo dedicated many tables, and amongſt theſe, one great one of gold (on which the ſacred bread was laid) the reſt not farre inferiour, yet made after divers manners, held ewers and platters of gold, to the number of twenty thouſand, and of ſilver fourty thouſand. He made likewiſe ten thouſand candleſticks (according as Moſes had commanded) whereof one he dedicated in the Temple, that according to the law it might give light there in the day time. He made a table alſo, on which the loaves of bread were laid, on the North ſide of the Temple, hard by the Candleſtick, which was
B placed towards the Southward. The Altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were incloſed in that part of the Temple that contained fourty cubits, before the tapeſtry of the holy of holieſt, where the Ark ſhould be placed. The King alſo cauſed fourſcore thouſand pots, and a thouſand hundreth of ewers of gold, and twice as many of ſilver, to be made; & fourſcore thouſand plates of gold, and twice ſo many of ſilver, to offer the kneaded flower in them upon the Altar; and threeſcore thouſand cups of gold, and twice ſo many of ſilver; to lay the flower mingled with oyl thereon; and two thouſand meaſures of gold, and twenty thouſand of ſilver, reſembling a Hin or an Epha of Moſes. Twenty thouſand of Cenſers alſo of gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the temple; and other cenſers
C likewiſe in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the leſſer, which was within the Temple, to the number of fifty thouſand, he prepared alſo a thouſand veſtments for the uſe of the Prieſts, with their ſurcots, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithſtanding there was but one Crown wherein Moſes had written the Name of God, which hath continued even untill this day. He made alſo ten thouſand ſtoles for the Prieſts of fine linnen, with ſcarlet girdles, for every one of them; two hundreth thouſand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moſes, and fourty thouſand inſtruments of Muſick to record and praiſe God with (as the Pſaltery and harp of a mixt matter, the fifth part gold, and the fourth part ſilver.) All which Solomon moſt magnificently prepared for the ſervice of God, D ſparing no coſt, but imploying himſelf to the uttermoſt of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple: which he beautified and endowed with all theſe treaſures. He environed the Temple likewiſe with a certain wall ſome three cubits high, which in our tongue we call Giſon, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Prieſts onely. Without this wall there ſtood a Temple four-ſquare with great and broad Iles, which opened with very great gates, every one according to the quarter of the wind; and the doors thereof were covered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewiſe that kept the ordinances of Moſes. It may not be ſpoken or ſcarcely believed although it were ſeen, how admirable that exteriour Temple was: for he filled huge trenches which by reaſon of their unmeaſurable depth, could not be lookt down into without vehement apprehenſion of fear (for they were four hundreth cubits deep) yet notwithſtanding
E he filled them, and raiſed them to the height of the hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this means it came to paſſe, that the walk without the Temple was equalled with the foundation of the ſame. This did he begirt with double porches, ſuſtained by pillars of rich ſtone; the roof whereof were of poliſhed Cedar, and the gates were of maſſive ſilver.

After that King Solomon had in ſeven years finiſhed theſe ſo huge, fair, and magnificent buildings, and all the other neceſſaries which he had beſtowed upon the Temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and confirmed his readineſſe to be ſuch, that that which at the firſt ſight might require a mans whole life to finiſh, he accompliſhed in few years, in reſpect of the greatneſſe of the Temple: He wrote unto the Governours and Elders of the F Hebrews, commanding them to aſſemble all the people in Jeruſalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Ark of God: and although this aſſembly was publickly proclaimed, yet ſcarcely did the people make their appearance in Jeruſalem before the ſeventh moneth, which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feaſt of Tabernacles, which the Hebrews moſt religiouſly obſerve and honour with great feſtivals. They therefore took the Ark and Tabernacle that Moſes had beforetime made, with all thoſe neceſſaries which appertained to the Divine ſervice, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people, with the Levites marched before, having their cattel ready to ſacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of divers ſlaughtered beaſts, burning an infinite quantity of perfumes, wherewith the air was filled round about, the ſent whereof whereof diſperſed it ſelf farre and near, to make it known that God would be preſent in that new builded and conſecrated place (if we may ſo ſpeak of divine things after a humane manner.) Thus ceaſed they not to ſing and dance untill they came unto the Temple: and after this ſort conducted they the Ark. But when it was to be carried into the holy of holies, the reſt of the multitude departed, and the Prieſts onely placed it under the two Cherubims, who imbraced it with their wings, as if it had been covered with a pavillion or ſome canopie: for they had been expreſly faſhioned after that manner by the workmen. The Ark contained nought elſe but the two tables of ſtone, in which were kept in writing the ten commandements pronounced by God on the mount Sinai. For as touching the Candleſtick, and the table, and altar of gold, he placed them in the temple before the moſt holy of holies, in places correſpondent to thoſe where they ſtood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinary ſacrifices, and placed the brazen Altar before the Temple near unto the gate: ſo that when it was opened, the other ſtood in ſight, and a man might ſee the ſervice and magnificence, that was uſed in the ſacrifices. And as touching the other utenſils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the temple. But after the Prieſts (having given order for all things about the Ark) were departed from thence, ſuddenly there fell amidſt the ſanctuary a thick cloud, not pitchy, nor ſuch as reſembleth winter clouds loaden with rain; but defuſed and temperate, which darkned the ſight of the Prieſts, ſo that they ſaw not one another, But thereby every mans mind was eaſily induced, and his opinion confirmed, that God was deſcended into the Temple, and willingly dwelled in the ſame: In effect, all men had no other opinion: But King Solomon ariſing from his throne wherein he was ſeated, addreſſed his prayers unto God, in ſuch words as he thought both to be agreeable to the divine nature, and convenient for him to uſe: O Lord (ſaid he) thou haſt an eternal houſe, neither are we ignorant that thou haſt builded this whole maſſe of the Univerſe for thy ſelf, which conſiſteth of heaven, earth, air and ſeas: which thou altogether filleſt, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore have we adorned and erected this Temple to thy Name, to the end that we might offer up our ſacrifices and prayers in the ſame, and ſend them up to heaven (as a ſweet ſacrifice) to obtain thy favour, aſſuring our ſelves that thou art here preſent alſo, and wilt never be abſent from this place. For whereas thou ſeeſt all things, heareſt all things, yet forſakeſt thou not us at all: neither doeſt thou abandon the place where thou doeſt worthily inhabit: but rather thou art alwaies near unto all men, but in eſpecial preſent with thoſe that think on thee day and night. Theſe words ſpake he, looking upwards towards God, and afterwards addreſſing himſelf unto the people, he ſpake unto them as touching his power and providence, how he had foretold his father David of all that which ſhould happen: the greater part whereof was already accompliſhed, and the reſt was ſhortly to ſucceed. Furthermore, he declared how God himſelf had given him his name before he was born, and that it was known how he ſhould be called: and how at ſuch time as he ſhould be King after the deceaſe of his father, he ſhould build him a Temple; which things they ſaw brought to paſſe according as they were foretold; for which they ought to give God thanks. and not to loſe any hope of any of thoſe things that had been promiſed them in regard of their happineſſe, having occaſion of belief by the ſight of thoſe things which they then beheld.

When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he turned again and beheld the Temple, and lifting up his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impoſſible (ſaid he) for men to yeeld effectual thanks unto God for thoſe benefits they have received of him: for God (who is more abundant then all men) hath no need of them: But (O Lord) it behoveth us, that ſince of thy grace thou haſt made us more excellent then other living creatures, we ſhould bleſſe and give thanks unto thy Majeſty, and in eſpecial it concerneth us to honour thee for the benefits thou haſt beſtowed on our family, and all the Hebrew Nation. But with what other means then ought we to appeaſe thee when thou art diſpleaſed, and when we are to entertein thy mercy, then by that voice which we draw from the air, and which, as we know, mounteth back again into the air? I ought therefore firſt of all to give thee thanks in reſpect of my father, whom from obſcurity thou haſt raiſed to high majeſty: next, for that thou haſt fulfilled all thoſe things which thou haſt fore-prophecied of me, until this preſent day; I beſeech the for thee time to come to furniſh me with thoſe things, that thou mayeſt give unto men that are dear unto thee, which is, that thou increaſe our houſe every way, according as thou haſt promiſed my father David to perform during his life, and at ſuch time as he was near unto his death: namely, that the Kingdome ſhould continue in our familie, and that his race ſhould multiply in innumerable ſucceſſions. Beſtow thou this benefit upon us, and bequeath unto all mine, that vertue wherein thou

Moreover, I beſeech thee that a portion of thy Spirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may underſtand that thou dwelleſt upon earth for not onely this Temple, but the whole heaven, and the depth of things that are under the ſame, are too little for thy habitation. I beſeech thee therefore that it may pleaſe thee to continue it for thine own, to the end it may never be deſtroyed by the enemy, but that thou wilt alwaies have care of it, as of thine own peculiar inheritance. And if it ſhall fall out that thy people run aſtray, and that afterwards being puniſhed by thee, by ſome puniſhment of death, peſtilence or any ſuch chaſtiſement (by which thou reclaimeſt thoſe that offend thee, to the obſervation of thy laws) they have recourſe unto this Temple, aſſembling, beſeeching, and requiring thee of mercy; hear them I beſeech thee, as being preſent in this place, and have compaſſion on them, and deliver them from their adverſities.

The year of the world, 2941. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 1023.

Solomon humbly beſeecheth God, that he will protect this Temple as his own houſe.

Neither do I onely intreat thee for the Hebrews when they ſhall have offended thee: but
B if it happen that any one arrive here from any part of the world, of what countrey ſoever he be, to demand and require the fruition of this mercy, hear thou him, I pray thee, and grant his requeſt: For by this means all men ſhall know, that it is thy will that thy houſe ſhou'd be builded in this place, and that we are not inhumane by nature, but that we have deſired that thy help and the communication of thy bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed, not onely on thoſe of our nation, but alſo on all the world. This ſaid, he caſt himſelf flat upon his face, and continued in prayer a long time, and afterwards riſing again, he offered ſacrifices upon the Altar; and having filled the Temple with entire offerings, he knew moſt evidently that God did gratefully account and accept of his oblations: for a fire trilling thorow the aire, and
C lighting upon the Altar in the ſight of all men, conſumed and devoured the ſacrifice. When this viſion had hapned, the people manifeſtly conjectured that Gods abode ſhould be in that Temple, and with great joy humbled themſelves on their faces, and lay proſtrate on the pavement. But the King began to praiſe God, and incited the people to do the like, conſidering they had already received the teſtimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwaies merciful unto them, & that he would keep them for ever in cleanneſſe and uncorrupt minds, and that they might juſtly and religiouſly lead their lives in obſerving thoſe Commandments which he had given them by Moſes. For in ſo doing, the people of the Hebrews ſhould proſper and grow more happy, then all the nations of the world.
D Moreover, he exhorted them to keep in their remembrance thoſe means, by which the benefits they poſſeſſed had been gotten; aſſuring them that by the ſame they ſhould retain continuance, increaſe, and multiplication thereof. For they ought to think that they received them not, but for their piety & Juſtice; and that it was all one for men to get that which they wanted, as to keep that which was gotten, without defaulting in any thing. When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly (having firſt of all accompliſhed the ſacrifices both for himſelf and the people, by offering up twelve thouſand Oxen, and ſixſcore thouſand ſheep.) For then firſt of all was the Temple embrewed with the blood of the ſlaughtered ſacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their wives and children, were banquetted therein. The King alſo feaſting with the whole people, celebrated
E the ſolemnity of the Tabernacles for the ſpace of fourteen daies in great pomp and magnificence. And when as all things were ſufficiently performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned the ſervice of God, every one (diſmiſſed by the King) departed to his own dwelling place, giving him hearty thanks for the care he had of them, and for the works he had done for them, praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant their King Solomon a long life. And thus they returned home with joy, praiſing and ſinging hymnes unto God, ſo that they rid their way, and returned to their families with great treaſure, and without any travel.

After then that they had conducted the Ark into the Temple, and had beheld the greatneſſe and beauty of the ſame, and had celebrated moſt excellent ſacrifices, and made great ſolemnities, they returned every one unto his City. But a viſion that night appeared unto F the King during his ſleep, which gave him aſſurance that God had heard his prayer, and that he would keep his Temple and dwell in the ſame for ever (if ſo be his poſterity and all the people addicted themſelves to live vertuouſly:) promiſing himſelf in eſpecial, that if he continued in the obſervation of thoſe advertiſements which his father had preſcribed him, he would raiſe him to the full infinity of felicity, and thoſe of his poſterity ſhould obtain the royalty over all the Countrey, and over the tribe of Juda: but if he forgot the exerciſes of piety, and exchanged them for the ſervice of ſtrange gods, he would pluck him up by the roots, without leaving any remainder here to raign after him; neither ſhould the people of Iſrael remain unpuniſhed, but ſhould be exterminate by infinite wars and adverſities, and he caſt out of the countrey which he had given unto their anceſtors, and become

» time have been so advanced by him in riches and honours: and they shall understand there-

1 King. 7. 1. Hedio & Kuffinus, chap. 5. Solomons Palace finnished in thirteen years.

Seven yeers after the Temple had been thus builded (as it hath been heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he scarcely finished in thirteen yeers space H (for he was not so intent and earnest in building therof, as he was in the structure of the Temple.) For although the Temple was very great, and of incredible and marvellous magnificence, yet so it is, that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workmen, it was thorowly finished within the term of the years aforesaid. But the royal Palaces, being far lesser then was the temple, were builded more slowly, because the stuffe had not been prepared so long time before, neither with so great affection; and the rather, because the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Notwithstanding, this house was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the countrey and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it shall not be amisse if I declare all the order and disposition of the same house, that by the description thereof the Reader may both gather and consider the whole I amplitude thereof: It was a great and goodly lodging, sustained by divers pillars, prepared to receive and contain much people at the time of their assemblies, wherein they intreated of affairs, and held pleas. It was a hundred cubits in length, and in breadth fifty, and in height thirty, comprized under sixteen square pillars covered with Corinthian work, with stairs of the like measure, and carved gates, both pleasant for sight, and fit for fortification.

v. 8. The Hall. The Tribunal.

In the midst of this space, and hard by the Temple, there was another square Pavillion thirty cubits large, sustained with strong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunal, on which the King sate to give judgement; unto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queen. All the chambers, as well those that were ordi- K narily in use, as those for recreation after he had retired himself from publick affairs, were adorned with planks of carved Cedar, and were builded partly of stone tenne cubits square, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought (such as are wont to adorn Temples and Palaces) and are found out by the most curious and cunning Masons. And that which made it more beautiful, were three panes of Tapistry, and the fourth admirable for the artificiall engravings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of divers sorts, shadowed with their branches and leaves, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would have thought that they shook, the workmanship was so exquisite and curious that covered the stone. The rest, as farre as the roofe, was enchased, and flourished with divers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleasure, with very long L porches to beautifie the Palace; amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make banquets and feasts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the necessaries belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of those that banqueted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugenesse and variety of these royal lodgings, both greater and lesser; of those that were hidden under the earth, as of those which being lifted up in the air, did most apparantly manifest their beauty: the pleasant arbors likewise delightful to behold, and most contenting in summer, for that they were covered and warranted from the heat. To speak in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of gold, and of silver: the floores and walls were figured with diversity of flowers and of precious stones, M inchased in gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which shined with such like ornaments. There was likewise erected a most mighty Throne, made in form of a Tribunall, with six steps of pure Ivory: on each side of which there stood two ramping Lions, and the like number were placed above. The stage of the Throne was after the form of hands, that laid hold on the King: and he sate upon a half Oxe looking backwards: and this Throne was all invironed with gold.

Solomon builded all this that hath been spoken of, in the space of twenty years, being furnished by Hiram King of the Tyrians for these his buildings, with great sums of gold, and farre more greater of silver, besides a quantity of Cedar and Pine-trees. Solomon also remunerated him,

A him, and gave him great preſents, and ſent him every yeer ſufficient of corn, wine and oyle (as we have heretofore declared) whereof he ſtood in great need, by reaſon that his Countrey was an Iſland. And beſides that, he gave him twenty Cities in Galilee, not farre diſtant from Tyre. Hiram having viſited them, and not well pleaſed with them, ſent unto Solomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no uſe for his Cities: and from that time forward they were called the Countrey of Chebal, which is as much to ſay in the Phœnician tongue, as unpleaſant. Hiram likewiſe ſent unto Solomon certain myſteries, and difficult queſtion, requiring him to decide the ſame, and to diſſolve thoſe doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Solomon being a man of ripe judgement and underſtanding, pretermitted none of them; but after he had attained their reſolution in his own opinion, and had gathered the ſenſe, he expreſſed and opened the ſame. Of theſe two Kings, Menander (who tranſlated the B Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phœnician tongue into Greek) maketh mention ſpeaking after this manner: after the deceaſe of Abibale, Hiram his ſonne ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, who lived fifty and three yeers, and reigned thirty and four. He annexed the field with his called Ample, unto the Iſland, and dedicated a golden pillar in Jupiters Temple. He alſo cauſed a great quantity of wood to be hewed down in the mountain Libanus, to make covers and roofes for Temples. For having pulled down ſome ancient Temples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Aſtrate, and made his firſt building of Hercules in the moneth of Peritien, & made war againſt the Eucecans, who refuſed to pay their tributes: and after he had once again brought them under his ſubjection, he returned to
C his own Palace. In his time lived the young ſonne of Abdimon, who alwaies reſolved thoſe queſtions which Solomon King of Jeruſalem propoſed. Dius alſo maketh mention of him in theſe tearmes: After the deceaſe of Abibale, his ſon Hiram raigned: he it was that fortified the quarter of the city to the Eaſtward, and enlarged the ſame, and conjoyned the Temple of Olympian Jupiter to the City, which before that time was in another place, and filled all the place between them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of gold; and afterwards going up to Libanus, he hewed down timber to build temples withall. He ſaid alſo, that Solomon raigning at that time in Jeruſalem, ſent unto Hiram certain ſubtil queſtions, demanding the expoſition thereof under this condition, that if he declared them not, in way of penalty he ſhould pay a great ſumme of money; and afterwards that a certain Tyrian called D Abdimon, expounded that which had been propoſed, and in lieu thereof propoſed certain others, which Solomon could not expound, and for that occaſion he paid a great ſumme of money unto Hiram. This is it that Dius writeth.

The King ſeeing that the City wanted both bulwarks and towers to ſecure the ſame, and that the ſtrength of the ſame was no way anſwerable to the dignity thereof, he repaired the walls, and erected great towers on the ſame. Moreover he builded certain cities, which deſerve to be memorized amongſt the the moſt renowned, namely, Aſor and Magedon, and for the third, the City of Gaza in the countrey of the Philiſtines: againſt which Pharao King of Egypt led out his army, and took it by force, and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof to the ſword, he deſtroyed the ſame, and afterwards he gave it in dower unto his daughter
E which married with Solomon. For which cauſe the King fortified it. Seeing it to be already ſufficiently fenced by nature, and that it ſtood very commodiouſly for the warre, and to hinder the invaſions of the enemy that might happen. Not farre from thence he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Baleth. Beſides theſe he builded others, which were cities of recreation and pleaſure, by reaſon of the good temperature of the aire, and the pleaſantneſſe of the fruits, and in eſpecially the ſweet ſtreamy rivers wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the deſart that is above Syria, and conquering the ſame, he builded, another great City two daies journey diſtant from the higher Syria, a daies journey from Euphrates, and ſix from the great Babylon. The cauſe why this city was inhabited farre from the civill and peopled quarters of Syria, was, becauſe
F in no place of the lower countrey there was water to be fouud, and in this City onely there were fountaines and ſprings. He therefore builded this City, and begirt it with ſtrong walls and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians term it by, even at this day and amongſt the Greeks is called Palmyra.) And theſe were Solomons works in that time. But for that there are divers that demand the queſtion how it commeth to paſſe, that all the Kings of Egypt that have been ſince Minæus the founder of Memphis, and who raigned divers yeers before our great anceſtor Abraham, who (I ſay) have been till Solomons time, for the ſpace of more then thirteen hundred yeers, have been called Pharaohs, deriving that name from one that raigned in the mid-time between both: I have thought it requiſite to manifeſt the ſame to the intent to reſolve that doubt, and expreſſe the cauſe of that, name, name. The name of Pharao amongst the Egyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I think G that from their childood they had other distinct names, and that afterward when they are created Kings, they take upon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no lesse, then Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria having been before-time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the Kingdome, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first King.) The Romane Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they have other names, at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæsars, because the soveraignty and honour whereunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was given them by their fathers, is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I think) that although Herodotus of Halicarnessus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there have been three hundred and thirty Kings of Egypt; yet declareth he not their names, be- H cause they were called Pharaohs. For when after these a woman had obtained the Kingdome, he called her by her own proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who have been Kings, were usually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated unto this woman: for which cause it was necessary to declare her own first name. For mine own part, I have found in the books of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father in law to Solomon, no one of the Kings of Egypt have been called by that name: and that some little while after, the aforenamed woman came unto Solomon, who raigned in Egypt and Æthiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I have made mention of it, to make it known that our records, and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, accord in many things. I

1 King.9.16, ad 21. Solomon compelleth the remainder of the Chanaanites to pay tribute. The thraldome of the Chanaanites. 1 King. 9.16, ad 21.

But King Solomon conquered the Chanaanites (which till that time were not under his subjection) and those that inhabited the mountain Libanus, as farre as the City of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them every year such, as he might employ in servile actions, and in domestical businesse, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slave: neither was it convenient, that since God had subjected divers nations under them (whom they might make slaves of) that they should tie those of their own nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in arms, and rather took delight to mount Chariots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaves. Over the Chanaanites (whom he employed in his service) he appointed five hundred and fifty Commissaries, who had their K charge and authority from the King, and tasked them to those works and handy labours wherein they imployed them. He builded a Navy also in the gulfe of Egypt, in a certain place of the red sea called Asiongaber, which is named Berenice, not farre from the City of Elana (which countrey in times past appertained to the Jewes.) And toward the building of his Navy, he obtained of Hiram King of Tyre, a very convenient furtherance: for he lent him modules of ships, and men that were skilful in Navigation, whom he charged to saile with his procurers and factors, to the countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this present the Land of Gold, in the country of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned back again unto the King, after they had gathered about four hundred talents. L

1 King. 10.1, ad 18. The Queen of Egypt and Ethiope resorteth to Solomon.

About this time the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia (a woman adorned with wisdome, and admirable in all other things) having heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Solomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person unto the King, under purpose to confirme her beliefe by experience, and not by hear-say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is believed by one or other, and is but onely grounded on relation. She therefore resolved to come and see him, and especially to make trial of his wisedome: which she narrowly sifted, by proposing certain difficult questions unto him, which she had conceived in her mind. She therefore repaired unto Jerusalem with great pompe, glory, and riches; for she brought with her certain Camels charged with gold, odours, and M precious stones of great value. After that the King had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, he easily comprehended in his mind those doubts which she had proposed unto him, and gave her a more speedy solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was ravished with the incredible wisedome of Solomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in special she wondred at his Palace, considering the greatnesse and beauty thereof; and above all, at the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same: wherein she perceived the great wisedome of the king: but above all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinary table, and the apparel and service of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his servants likewise, and the goodly order which they observed in their service; Moreover the sacrifices that

A were every day offered up unto God, and the care and diligence of the Priests in discharging their offices, ravished her more then all the rest, when she observed them daily: and not able to contain her selfe within the termes of astonishment at that she saw, she manifestly expressed how wonderfully she was affected, expressing to the King in her plain and publike discourse, that she knew not what to think of those things which she had beheld. O King (said she) all that which a man knoweth by heare-say may be mis-beleeved. But the renown which is come unto our eares as touching your riches, both those which you have in your selfe (I mean your wisedome and prudence) as those also which your Kingdom hath brought you, is neither false nor fained; which notwithstanding, yet doth it make your felicitie farre lesse then that which I see before mine eyes: for report dependeth onely on heare-say, nei-
B ther giveth it so certain a notice of things, as the sight discovereth and representeth, when one is neer unto the same. For mine own part, in that I gave no credit to the greatnesse and multitude of that I have heard, I have seen farre more then I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrews to be most happy; and your servants & friends most blessed, who are continuall witnesses & hearers of your wisedome. And each one of you ought to give God thanks, that he hath so much loved this region and the inhabitants thereof, that he hath established you in the royall seat. I will discover likewise, how besides her words she expressed her affection she bare unto the King, in testifying the same by divers presents which she offered unto him. For she gave him twenty talents of gold, and an innumerable quantity of sweet odours and precious stones. It is said likewise, that we have that plant that distilleth balme, and which our countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princesse.
C Solomon for his part requited her bountifull presents with the like, which she made choice of according to her own liking: for there was nothing which she could require, which he granted not unto her: shewing himselfe most ready to give her satisfaction with a liberall and royall heart. When the Queen of Egypt and Æthiopia had received these favours at the Kings hands (according as it hath been spoken) and he likewise had magnificently requited her, she returned back again into her own countrey.

About the same time there was brought unto the King from the countrey called the Region of gold, a quantitie of precious stones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was imployed to make supporters in the Temple, and in the Kings house, and to make instruments of mu-D sicke likewise, as Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Levites might praise God. Amongst all the gifts that were ever presented unto Solomon, that which was given him at that time, was most excellent in greatnesse and beauty. But let no man think, that the Pine-wood (which we speak of) had any resemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants to delude their chapmen, sell for the same. For they are like unto fig trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to manifest in this place, lest any man should be deceived thorow ignorance, in discerning the one from the other: because the affairs of Solomon have drawn us to make mention of this matter. The weight of gold which this Navy brought unto the King, was six hundreth, sixty and six talents: beside that which the merchants bought themselves, or that which the Kings and E Princes of Arabia had sent unto him in way of present. This gold caused he to be molten downe, and made thereof two hundreth targets, each one weighing six hundreth sicles; and three hundreth bucklers, each of them weighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. He caused also divers vessels of gold and precious stones to be made for the use of his table, laboured with as curious conceit as might be; the rest of his necessaries also were of gold: for nothing was either bought or sold for silver. For the King had many ships upon the sea called Tharsis, which upon his commandment carried divers merchandize into the remote countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and silver, and much Ivory and Æthiopian Moores and Apes, and this Navigation in sayling to and fro, was finished in three yeers. The renown and fame also of So-
F lomons vertues and wisedome spred farre and neer throughout all Nations: so that the Kings of what countrey soever they were, had a desire to see his presence, because they beleeved not the report, and desired to manifest their affection to him by magnificent presents. They therefore sent him vessels of gold and of silver, scarlet robes, and all sorts of aromatique drugges, horses and chariots, mules and sumpter-horses, wherein (as it was reported unto them) the King took pleasure, by reason of their force and beauty: so that to the number of horses and chariots which he had before, there were annexed foure hundreth more, which had been sent him in way of present. For before that, he had a thousand chariots, and twenty thousand goodly horse, excellent for shape and swiftnesse: so that the like were not to be found, that were comparable with them for beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater Ittan.

There was a certain place called Ittan, ſome eight leagues diſtant off of Jeruſalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleaſant fountains of water, whether he uſually and willingly retired himſelfe for his pleaſure, uſing in all things a moſt admirable providence and promptitude, and taking pleaſure in thoſe things that were well contrived. He forgot not likewiſe to make cauſeys, but cauſed the hie wayes that led to Jeruſalem (where he made his aboade) to be paved with black ſtone, both to the intent to make them more acceſſible for thoſe that travelled to and fro, as to ſhew the magnificence and riches of his government. He then divided his Chariots, and placed them in ſuch ſort, that in every City there was a prefixed number, and ſome few he kept about himſelfe; and thoſe Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he ſtored Jeruſalem alſo with aboundance of ſilver, ſo that it was as plentifull as ſtones; and with Cedar wood (whereof before that time there was no quantitie) he ſtored the countrey, that it was as plentifull to be had as wilde fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Egypt alſo, to buy him certain chariots drawn by two horſes, for the price of ſix hundreth drachmes of ſilver, which he ſent unto the Kings of Syria, and to thoſe on the other ſide of Euphrates. Ægyptian horſes.

Now although he were the moſt magnificent and entirely beloved of God, ſurpaſſing both in prudence and riches all thoſe that before him had the government of the Hebrews; yet continued he not in this eſtate untill the end. For, forſaking the obſervation of the ordinances of his Fathers, his latter yeers were not correſpondent to his former converſation, which heretofore we have declared: for he grew altogether diſſolute and immoderately given over to women, and was not content onely with thoſe of his own countrey, but took alſo ſtrange women for his wives, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby he tranſgreſſed the laws of marriage inſtituted by Moſes, who inhibited to marry with thoſe of forraine nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods alſo, to gratifie and expreſſe the love which he bare unto them: which thing the Law-maker foreſeeing, he had forbidden the Iſraelites to marrie with thoſe that were not of their own nation, for fear leſt conforming themſelves unto forrain faſhions, they ſhould fall and tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their forefathers: and undertake to honour thoſe gods, and forſake and forget the honour due unto the true God. But Solomon tranſported with theſe brutiſh pleaſures, made no account of theſe things, but took him wives of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundreth concubines, beſides the daughter of Pharao King of Egypt: by which means he was exceſſively overcome by them, inſomuch as he followed their examples, and was forced to give a teſtimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordering his life according to the faſhion of their countries. As therefore he increaſed in yeers, and his judgement grew weak, he was in ſuch ſort miſ-led, that he could not retain in memory the cuſtomes of his countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worſhip of thoſe gods which were introduced by his wives. Before all this he chanced to ſinne and default in the obſervation of the law, at ſuch time as he made the ſimilitudes of beaſts of braſſe to underprop the veſſell called the great ſea, and thoſe of Lions which he cauſed to be ſet unto his Throne: for that action of his ill beſeemed him, who had a moſt excellent and domeſticall example of vertue in the perſon of his father, beſides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithfull ſervant of God; whence it came to paſſe, that by neglecting to follow his ſteps (notwithſtanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing unto him at two ſeverall times) he died moſt ignominiouſly. There came therefore unto him a Prophet ſent from God, telling him that his ſins were manifeſt and notorious in Gods ſight, threatning him that ere long he ſhould repent the wickedneſſe he had committed. Yet notwithſtanding, the Realme ſhould not be taken from him during his life, becauſe God had promiſed David that he ſhould be his ſucceſſour in the ſame: but after his deceaſe his ſonne ſhould beare the penaltie of the ſame; not ſo as all the people ſhould revolt, but that he would give ten tribes unto his ſervant, and leave two unto the grand childe of David, becauſe he had loved God, and by reaſon of the City of Jeruſalem, where it pleaſed him to make his habitation. A time after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that (God ſo pleaſing) there roſe up an enemy againſt him, who was called Ader, by nation an Idumæan, and of the princely ſtock, who upon this occaſion grounded his rebellion and inſurrection. For, at ſuch time as Joab General of Davids army, had conquered Idumæa, and in the ſpace of ſix moneths defeated all the youth, and thoſe that were capable to bear arms, he fled unto Pharaoh King of Egypt who entertained him very courteouſly, and gave him an houſe, and lands for his maintenance, and loved him dearly when he came to mans eſtate; ſo that he married him with Taphines his wifes ſiſter, on whom he begat a ſon, who was brought up with the Kings children: who having intelligence in Egypt of David and Joabs death, addreſſed himſelf unto Pharaoh, and beſought him to give him leave to repair into his own countrey.

v. 14. ad 22. Ader, enemy to Solomon. Ader fled into Egypt. Ader beſeecheth Pharaoh to diſmiſſe him that he might return into his countrey.

B The King asked him what he wanted; or what the cauſe was that moved him to be ſo haſty to forſake him? Notwithſtanding therefore that he importuned and requeſted him divers times, yet prevailed he nothing with him for that time. But when Solomons fortunes began to decline (by reaſon of his iniquities above mentioned) and the wrath of God provoked againſt him) Ader by Gods permiſſion came into Idumæa, after he was licenced by Pharaoh to depart. But being unable to move the people to revolt from Solomon, by reaſon of the ſtrong garriſons he held, and knowing that without hazard of his own perſon, he could move no alterations or innovation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himſelf with a certain man called Raas (who was fled from his Maſter Adarezer, King of Sophone, and lived like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendſhip with him, and a great ſort of outlawes, and theeves that were his followers, and

Moreover, a certain man called Jeroboam the ſon of Nebat, by nation a Jew, rebelled againſt Solomon, and raiſed his hopes above his eſtate, perſwaded thereunto by a Propheſie that concerned him, and incited him unto the action. For being left very young by his father, and carefully inſtructed by his mother, as ſoon as Solomon perceived him to be of a noble and couragious ſpirit, he made him Commiſſary over the building of the walls, at ſuch time as he

In this office he behaved himſelf ſo well, that the King thought very well thereof, and in way of recompence, gave him the eſtate of General over the tribe of Joſeph. Towards which, whileſt he travelled from Jeruſalem, a certain Prophet met him upon the way (who was of the City of Silo, called Achias) who approaching near unto him, and ſaluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themſelves were preſent, and there renting the garment which he wore upon his back in twelve pieces, he commanded Jereboam to take ten, telling him that God had ſo decreed, and how he would rent the government from Solomon, and reſerve onely one tribe unto his ſon, with that other which was annexed unto it, by reaſon of the promiſe made to David; and to thee (ſaid he) he giveth the other ten, becauſe Solomon hath offended God, and addicted himſelf to the love of ſtrange women, and the ſervice of forraign gods.

v. 30. Achias the Prophet foretelleth that he ſhould be King over the ten tribes.

E Now ſith thou knoweſt the cauſe wherefore God hath alienated the kingdome from Solomon, be thou juſt, and obſerve thou the lawes; for if thou behaveſt thy ſelf in ſuch ſort as thou knoweſt David did, a great reward of thy piety, and recompence of thy obſervance attendeth thee, ſo that thou ſhalt become as mighty as David hath been before thee. Jeroboam confirmed in great hopes by theſe words of the Prophet, being by nature haughty, in years young, and beſides that, deſirous of authority: he took no reſt, but being poſſeſſed of the place of General, and remembring himſelf of that which had been told him by Achias, he preſently began to perſwade the people to revolt from Solomon, and to chuſe him for their King. Solomon hearing newes of this his deliberation and enterprize, ſought the means

The death of Solomon. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. al. 4. 1 Reg. 12. 1, ad 11.

BUt when Solomon was very old, he died, after he had raigned fourscore years, and lived ninety four, and was buried in Jerusalem; of all Kings the most happy, rich, and prudent, (except that sin whereunto he was drawn by women in his old age) of whom and those calamities that presently after befell the Hebrewes, we have sufficiently spoken. After the death of Solomon, as soon as his sonne Roboam (whom he begat upon an Ammonitish women, called Nooma) succeeded him in the kingdome, the Governours of the people sent certain messengers into Egypt, to recall Jeroboam: who arriving in the City of Sichem, Roboam came thither also, resolving himself in that assembly of the Israelites, to take the kingdome upon him by the peoples consent. To him therefore the Princes of the people resorted with Jeroboam, beseeching him that he would remit somewhat of their servitude, and shew himself more merciful then his father had been: for that under his government they had been sorely oppressed, assuring him that by that meanes his kingdome should be the more assured, if so be he had rather be beloved then feared. He some three dayes after promised them to return an answer to their demands, and by that meanes drew them into suspition, that upon the motion he misliked of the offers they had proposed: for they thought it became his years to be affable and ready to deserve well, yet remained there some hope in them, that they had not presently suffered the repulse. Mean while, he calling about him his fathers friends, consulted upon the matter, what answer he should give the people: Who, for that they wished his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perswaded him to speak familiarly unto the people, and remitting a little of his kingly austerity, to apply himself to the favour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability he might the more easily draw their hearts unto him, because that by a natural inclination, subjects take delight in those kings that are courteous, who with a certain decent familiarity, entertain themselves amongst them. But Roboom rejected this counsel of theirs (which was both good and profitable in all occasions, but especially at such time, when it is upon the point to be inseated in a kingdom) and that not without Gods providence, since contrary to all reason he neglected the right course, and followed the perverse: so that calling unto him certain young men of his own humour and disposition, he certified them what the Elders had counselled him, and willed them to discover their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods permission suffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cause they counselled him to answer the people, that his little finger was more great then the loynes of his father, and that if they had experimented and endured grievances under him, that he would be far more rigorous; and that if his father had chastised them with the stroke of the whip, that they should expect to be punished by him with rude torments. The King delighted herewith, supposed the answer to be answerable to the dignity of his Empire. When as therefore the people were assembld on the third day to hear his resolution, and all of them were in suspence, expecting and desirous to heare him speak, from whom they hoped nought else but sweetnesse: Roboam contemning the counsel of his friends, proposed unto himself that of the young men. All which hapned by the will of God, to the end that that which Achias had propheſied might be fulfilled.

They touched by these his answers, no lesse then if they had been wounded with the sword, conceived a most hearty griet, and were displeased with him, and no lesse moved, then if they had already felt the mischief that was threatned: so that they began all of they to cry with a loud voyce, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Davids alliance, neither with his succession, telling him that they would onely leave the Temple his father had builded, unto his charge, and threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were so humously and grievously incensed, (that Roboam having sent unto them Adoram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perswade them to pardon his youth, if he had spoken any thing lightly, and unrespectively unto them) they could not endure to hear him speak, but slew and wel-nigh overwhelmed him with stones. Which when Roboam perceived (supposing that it was himself, who in the person of his officer was put to death, and stoned by the people) he feared lest in effect his life, and the fortune of his kingdome should fall into the like disaster. For which cause he suddenly ascended his chariot and fled to Jerusalem, where the tribe of Juda, and that of Benjamin (by their com-

But as touching the reſt of the people, from that day forward they revolted from the ſucceſſors of David, and proclaimed Jeroboam king of their eſtates. Roboam the ſon of Solomon being ſore diſpleaſed herewith, aſſembled the two Tribes of his obeiſance, with an intent to muſter one hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen men, to make war on Jeroboam and his people, and to inforce them by war to acknowledg him for their Soveraign. But God reſtrained him by the means of a Prophet, who forbad him to make war; ſaying, that it was ill befitting that war ſhould be waged betwixt two parties of one Nation, and the rather for that this their revolt had hapned by the will of God: by which means and perſwaſion he diſmiſſed his army. But firſt of all I will rehearſe that which Jeroboam King of Iſrael did, and afterwards ſubſequently I will declare the acts of Roboam King of the two Tribes, and thus ſhall the courſe of the hiſtory continue in due

v. 21, 22. Roboam intending to make war on thoſe tribes that revolted, is inhibited.

After that Jeroboam had planted his royal Court in the city of Sichem he made his ordinary aboad in that place, except that ſometimes he ſojourned in the city of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feaſt of tabernacles being at hand, Jeroboam (ſuppoſing that if he permitted the people to go up and worſhip God in Jeruſalem, and ſolemnize the feaſt in that place, they might either repent themſelves of the revolt, or being retained and withdrawn by the Temple and ſervice that was celebrated therein, they might be perſwaded to forſake him, and ſubmit themſelves to their firſt king; and by that means he might be drawn into danger of his life) practized and plotted this invention. He cauſed two golden calves to be
C caſt, and builded two ſeveral temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan (which is ſcituate neer unto the ſource of little Jordan.) In each of the chappels of theſe two towns, he placed one of theſe calves, and afterwards aſſembling the ten tribes that were under his ſubjection, he ſpake unto them in manner following:

The Court and Palace of Jeroboam.

v. 26, 27, 28. Why Jeroboams calves were made.

My friends and Countrey-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he aſſiſteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth them not, that ſerve him with true affection: For which cauſe I think it not convenient, that you go up unto Jeruſalem at that time, which is a city enemy unto us; neither that you make ſo long a journey in way of devotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, even as I have conſecrated two golden Calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that every one of you that inhabite neer
D unto thoſe Cities, tranſporting your ſelves to the ſame, may adore God. Neither ſhall you want Prieſts and Levites: for I will elect ſome ſuch among you, to the intent you have no more need of the tribe of Levi, or the ſons of Aaron. Whoſoever therefore amongſt you would be a Prieſt, let him offer Calves and Muttons unto God: which, as it is reported, Aaron the firſt Prieſt did.

Jeroboam perſwadeth the people to Idolatry.

By ſuch like ſpeeches ſeduced he the people, and cauſed them to fall from their fore-fathers religion, and tranſgreſs the ordinances of their countrey: and this was the beginning of all thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards fell upon the Hebrews: by which means being overcome in war, they fell into captivity and ſubjection of ſtrangers (whereof we will intreat further in place convenient.) Now when the feaſt of Tabernacles (which hapned in the ſeventh moneth) was at hand; he himſelf intended to celebrate in Bethel after the ſame manner, as E the two other Tribes had feaſted in Jeruſalem, and erected an Altar before the calfe, and was himſelf the High Prieſt, aſcending up to the Altar being aſſiſted by the Prieſts.

The neglect of Gods ſervice, is the cauſe of all evil.

Now at ſuch time as he was about to ſacrifice, and to offer up burnt-offerings in the ſight of the people, there came a Prophet and ſtood by him called Jadon (ſent from Jeruſalem by the commandement of God) who ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, and in the hearing of the King, turned himſelf towards the Altar, and ſpake after this manner: Thou Altar, Thou Altar, thus ſaith the Lord, there ſhall a man riſe of the tribe of David, called Joſias, he ſhall kill upon thee the falſe Prophets of his time, and ſhall burn the bones of the deceivers and ſeducers upon thee: And to the intent that each man may believe that this prophecy is true, it ſhall be confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar ſhall ſuddenly break, and the fat of the F ſacrifices that are laid thereon, ſhall be poured on the ground. Ieroboam diſpleaſed with theſe words of the Prophet, ſtretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he ſtretched out, became inſtantly withered, ſo that he could no more draw it back again to himſelf, but held it hanging down aſtoniſhed and mortified. On the other ſide the Altar cleft in twain, and all that was thereon fel down (according as the Prophet had foretold.) The king perceiving that the man had a true and divine ſpirit of prophecy, beſought him to pray unto God, that his hand might be reſtored him again in his full ſtrength and vigor: which he performed: ſo that his hand recovered again his natural ability; wherewith Ieroboam was very much contented, and invited the Prophet to dine with him. But Iadon answer'd him and said, that he neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the City, because God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him that it was not lawful for him to return the same way that he came. But the King admiring at the continencie of the man, began the more seriously to suspect his estate, and (conjecturing by those things which he had both seen and heard) he divined the assured disaster of his estate and fortunes. There dwelt in that City a certain false prophet, whom Jeroboam held in great honour, (in that he soothed him up in whatsoever was best pleasing to his eares.) This man at that time lay sick upon his bed, being faint through age; and when he was informed by his son that there was a Prophet come from Jerusalem, and what wonders he had wrought, and how Jeroboam by his prayers recovered again his withered hand; he fearing lest the King should make more account of this stranger, then of himself, commanded his sons presently H to saddle his Ass, and to have him in a readiness against his departure. Which when they had hastily performed, he mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom he overtook, where he rested himself under a thick shadowie Oak; and upon the first encountrey, saluted him, and afterwards expostulated with him, for that he had not visited him, neither accepted of that hospitality which he willingly would have afforded him. Iadon answered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taste any kinde of sustenance in any mans house that dwelt within the City. Truly, said the other, with me thou mightest eat, for I also am a Prophet, and honour the same God that thou doest: and now also come I unto thee by his commandement, to conduct thee back again into my house, and to entertain thee with a friendly dinner. These words of the false Prophet made Jadon credulous, so that I he turned back again with him. But as they sate at their banquet, and were making merry together, God appeared unto Jadon, and said unto him, that since he had broken his commandement, he should suffer punishment for the same: and withal expressed unto him the manner: which was, that in his return homewards, he should be torn in pieces by a Lion; and that he should not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Jeroboam should not respect Jadons words, who had been found a lyer. As therefore Jadon returned back to Jerusalem, a Lion met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Ass and slew him, yet offered he no violence to the Ass that bare him, which he preserved with the body of the Prophet, standing fast by the same, until such time as certain passengers beholding the spectacle, brought news thereof K into the town unto the false prophet, who sent his sonnes to bring back the body: which by their assistance he honourably buried, charging them that after his death they should bury his body by him, assuring them that all that which he had prophecied against that City, against the Altar, the Priests, and false prophets, was very true. And as touching himself, he commanded that after his decease they should bury him by him, because that being buried with him, there might no difference be made betwixt their bones, and his tomb might be the more honoured. When as therefore he had interred the Prophet and given his son these things in charge (being other wayes a most wicked and impious man) he addressed himself unto Jeroboam, and said unto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of L this mad man? "The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his "hand, and assured him that he accounted him a true and divine prophet, and one sent by "God. But the false prophet began most maliciously to overthrow his opinion, and disguise "the truth of that which hapned, by his perswasive words. For he inforced himself to infer, "that his hand was astonished through the travel he had taken in bearing the sacrifices, and "after that he had a little rested, that it came into his own natural estate again: and that the "Altar being freshly built, and divers great sacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twain, and "fell down through the weightiness of the charge. Consequently he declared unto him the "death of him, that had foretold these signs that were to come, and how he had been slain "by a Lion: for which cause he perswaded him to think that he in no sort was a Prophet, M "neither any wayes partaking with the truth of prophecy. By such like allegations he made the King believe that which he said; and having wholly distracted his thoughts from God and good works, and observation of Gods laws, he drew him to all wickedness and impiety: by which act of his he outraged God, and offended his laws, and sought daily after no other thing, then to invent some new and cursed wickedness that was far more hainous then all that which beforetime he had attempted. This is all that at this time we have to write, as concerning Jeroboam.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 10. Roboams defenced cities. 2. Chron. 11.5.

As touching Roboam, Solomons son (who was King of the two Tribes, as we have before this declared) he builded these great and strong Cities, Bethleem, Irama, Thecos, Bethsor, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Maresa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and

A and Hebron which being within the confines of Juda, he builded first. He builded also other great Cities in the countrey of the Benjamites, which he walled, and placed Garrisons and Governours in every one of them, and great store of corn, wine, and oyle: and generally in every city he made a great store-house with all sorts of provision, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets and launces. To him the Priests and Levites annexed themselves, who were dispersed thorow Israel, who came and dwelt in Jerusalem. For they took no pleasure to adore by compulsion those calves that Jeroboam had erected; and during the terme of three years, they increased the Kingdom of Roboam: who being married to one of his own line, had three children, and was afterwards married also with Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Absalon, who was of his parentage likewise, of whom he begat his son called Abiah. He had also divers other children by other women; but above all the rest, he loved Maacha most intirely. He had eighteen legitimate wives married unto him according B to the law, and thirty concubines; he had eight and twenty sonnes and threescore daughters, and declared for his successour in the kingdome Abiah the sonne of Maacha, and committed all his treasures and strong Forts unto his hands. But mortal men most usually are corrupted by the untoward flatteries of wavering fortune, as appeareth by this king. For Roboam seeing his kingdome thus increased; he bent himself to all unjust and impious actions, and contemned the service of God: the people also conformed themselves to his impieties. For the life of the subject is oftentimes perverted, by reason of the corrupt and dissolute life of their Princes; and those that are inferiours, beholding the riot of their superiours, will easily be withdrawn from all modesty, and follow those vices they professe, as if they
C had been their professed vertues: for should they do the contrary, they should seem to disannul and mis-like the actions of their Princes: As it hapned under the government of Roboam, where the subjects addicted themselves to impietie and all errours: for they would not make profession of honestie, for fear lest they should seem to study the means to be offensive unto the King.

Susac King of Egypt, after the spoile of Jerusalem, transporteth the riches of that City into Egypt.

D BUt God sent Susac King of Egypt to take vengeance for that excesse, which was committed against his Majestie by Roboam (whose actions Herodotus wrongfully ascribeth to Sesostris.) For this Susac in the fifth year of Roboams raign assembled a huge army of divers thousands of men, and brought them out against Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelve hundred Chariots, threescore thousand horsemen, and foure hundred thousand footmen. The greater part of these were Lybians, and Æthiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrewes countrey with this power, without stroke striking he seized the strongest places of the kingdome of Roboam, and fortified them, and at last came and encamped before Jerusalem. But Roboam and his associates, seeing themselves begirt with a strong siege on every side by Susacs army; at last had his recourse unto prayers: yet could he not move God to incline and favour him with the victo-
E ry. For the Prophet Samæas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like sort, as they had forsaken him and his service. Which when they heard, they suddenly lost their hearts, and seeing no meanes to escape, they all of them began to confesse that God had justly forsaken them, because they had shewed their impietie against him, and had perverted all his lawes. But God seeing them thus disposed, and making confession of their sins, said unto the Prophet, that he would not utterly destroy them: yet notwithstanding that he would deliver them into the hands of the Egyptians, to the end that they might learn whether it were more difficult to serve God, or men. When as therefore F King Susac had without bloodshed or resistance taken and surprised the city, and was received into the same by discomforted Roboam; he kept not those covenants that were made betwixt them, but spoyled the Temple, and took away with him those treasures that were dedicated unto God, and the service of the King, taking from thence innumerable thousands of gold and silver, not leaving any thing behind him. He carried away also those Targets and bucklers of gold, which were made by King Solomon: neither left he behind him the quiver of gold, which was offered by David, and received by him of the king of Sophena: Which done, he retired back again into his own countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnassus maketh mention (who differeth onely in the name of the King) and

v. 9, 10. Roboam for the golden shields and bucklers, maketh new of brasse.

v. 13, 14. Roboam dyeth, and Abias reigneth after him.

After the retreat of Sisac, King Roboam made shields and bucklers of brasse, instead of those of gold, and gave the like number unto his guard: and instead of living in a brave army, in a royal and Princely estate, he reigned after a servile and fearful manner, being all his life-time enemy to Jeroboam. He died after he had lived fifty seven years, whereof he reigned seventeen. He was a haughty and undiscreet man, who lost his estate, because he would not give credit to his fathers friends. He was buried in Jerusalem in the sepulchre of the Kings, and his son Abias succeeded him in his reign, at such time as Jeroboam had already reigned eighteen years over the ten tribes.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 11. 1 Reg. 14. 2. ad. 18.

Thus were these things terminated. It behoveth now at this present to declare that which Jeroboam did afterwards, and how he died. He observing no mean or end of his impietie, imployed himself continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrifices. But God with-held not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posterity. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimes was sick, about that time, he commanded his wife to lay aside her royal garment, and to apparel her self like a common woman, and afterwards to go to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be King: for which cause he willed her to repair unto him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her sonne should escape that sickness. Whereupon she disguised her self according as her husband had commanded her, and came unto the City of Silo where Achias dwelt; and as she was upon entring his house (notwithstanding he had lost his sight through age) God appeared unto him, and certified him in these two points: first, that Jeroboams wife came unto him; and next, all that he should answer to her demand. At such time therefore as she entred into his house, after the guise of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loud voice; Enter, thou wife of Jeroboam, wherefore hidest thou thy self? Thou canst not hide thy self from God, who hath certified me of thy coming, and hath informed me what answer I shall give unto thee. He therefore said unto her, that she should return unto her husband, and certifie him of Gods answer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I have made thee great; and having dismembred the kingdome from Davids posterity, I have given it unto thee: But thou hast forgotten the same; and having forsaken my service, hast molten down new gods, whom thou honourest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posterity, and cast them off for a prey unto dogs, and fouls of the air. For I will constitute a King over my people, that shall leave no one of Jeroboams race alive. The people also shall have part of this punishment, and shall be deprived of this their fruitful countrey, and be scattered among the regions on the other side of Euphrates, because they have followed the impieties of their king, and adoring those gods that were forged by him, have given over my sacrifice. And as concerning thy self (O woman) haste thee, and certifie thy husband of these things. For thou shalt find thy son dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the City, but he shall finish his dayes. He shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in general. For he onely was good of all the race of Jeroboam. I K L M

The haste which she used was importunate, because of her son whom she should see dead: by so much the sooner she hasted homeward, but it behoved her to use expedition in the behalf of her husband. When as therefore she was arrived, she found her son expiring, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited the rest unto Jeroboam.

Abias chap. 6. The exped. tion of Jeroboam againſt Abias king of Juda.

BUt Jeroboam was nothing moved therewith, but levied a great army, with an intent to make warre againſt Abias, the ſonne of Roboam who had obtained his fathers kingdome over the two Tribes. For he deſpiſed him becauſe he was young in yeaus. This notwithſtanding, the young king who was no whit diſmayed (although he underſtood of Jeroboams coming) but with greater wiſdome then was incident to his years, and beyond all expectation of his forward adverſary, he levied an army of two Tribes, with which he encountred Jeroboam at the mountain of Samaria; where incamping his hoſt near unto him, he provided all things in a readineſſe that were requiſite for the battel, and had with him four hundred thouſand fighting men, but Jeroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to give the alarum and charge, Abias ſtood up in a certain high place from whence he might be ſeen and heard, and making a ſigne with his hand, he required that Jeroboam and the people would firſt of all hear him peaceably; which granted to him, and each one attending in ſilence, he brake out into theſe words; There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promiſed the Kingdom to David and his poſterity for ever; I therefore greatly admire how you have revolted from my father, to ſubmit your ſelves to Jeroboam his ſervant, whom at this preſent you accompany to warre againſt thoſe whom God hath ordained to reign, and to take the kingdome from them, the greater part whereof Jeroboam uſurpeth unjuſtly even at this day, and which, as I ſuppoſe, he ſhall not enjoy long time. For he ſhall be puniſhed by God, and ſhall ceaſe to contradict his laws, and to diſhonour them as he doth continually, in perſwading you to do the like. You have received no injury at my fathers hands; but by reaſon that he was miſled by the ſiniſter counſels of certain wicked perſons, and ſpake unto you certain words which in appearance ſeemed unfitting in your eares, you have forſaken him in your diſpleaſure: but in effect, you have ſeparated your ſelves from God and his Commandements. Truly you ſhould have pardoned a young man untrained and untaught in Oratory, not onely for the rude words which he uſed, but although his youth and ignorance ſhould have moved him to commit ſome churliſh and indiſcreet action and errour, yet ſhould you have indured the ſame. For the fathers demerits ought to ſerve and ſatisfie the childrens defects. But you have had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this preſent, but lead forth a great Army againſt us. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your calves of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountains, which are witneſſes of your impiety and irreligion? Is it your great number that ſurpaſſeth ours by farre, that maketh you confident? Truly, the force of many thouſands is of no value, whereas the army fighteth in an unjuſt quarrel. For in on ely juſtice and pietie towards God, conſiſteth the moſt aſſured hope of obtaining victorie over a mans enemies; which muſt needs be on our ſide, who obſerve at all times the ordinances and ſervices of our God, whom mens hands have not faſhioned of corruptible matter, nor the ſubtiltie of a cunning king could not forge to deceive a communalty, but ſuch a one, whoſe work is the begininng and ending of all things. I therefore adviſe you, that preſently you repent your ſelves, and that taking a better way, you deſiſt from your warre, and acknowledge the laws of your forefathers; finally, thoſe ordinances, which have advanced you to ſo great felicity.

Thus ſpake Abias to the people. But whileſt he yet continued his diſcourſe, Jeroboam ſent certain of his ſouldiers by by-wayes to incloſe Abias within two ſtreights, before his followers could diſcover them. Now when Abias was thus incloſed in the midſt of his enemies, his Army began to be diſcomforted, and to loſe their courage: but he incouraged them, and exhorted them to put their truſt in God, who could not be incloſed by his enemies: ſo that all together having called upon God to aſſiſt them, and after that the Prieſts had ſounded the Trumpet, they thruſt in amongſt their enemies with a great ſhout, and God ſo blinded the underſtanding, and abated the force of Jeroboams ſouldiers, that they fled, and thoſe on Abias ſide had the upper hand. Never was there warre recorded by the Hiſtorians either amongſt the Greeks or Barbarians, that was purſued with ſo great a ſlaughter as the army of Jeroboam: whereby it appeared that this wonderful and admirable victory came from God. For they diſcomforted five hundred thouſand of their enemies, and took their moſt defenced places by force and ſpoiled them. Bethel and Ithan alſo with their lands and ſignories ſigniories belonging unto them: ſo that as long as Abias lived, Jeroboam was never after of force to raiſe any power ſince the loſſe he received. Abias ſurvived after this his victory, onely for the ſpace of three years; and was buried in Jeruſalem, in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors, leaving twenty two ſonnes and ſixteen daughters behind him, all which he begat on ſixteen women. His ſonne Aſa ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whoſe mother was called Maacha: under his government the countrey of Iſrael enjoyed a firm peace for the ſpace of ten years. This is that which we have obſerved of Abias, ſonne of Roboam, the ſon of Solomon: Jeroboam the King of the ten tribes died likewiſe, after he had reigned twentie two years. and Nadab his ſonne ſucceeded him, at ſuch time as Aſa had already reigned two years. The ſonne of Jeroboam governed two years, reſembling his father in impiety and wickedneſſe. During theſe two years, he made war againſt Gaban, a City of the Philiſtines, and encamped thereabout to ſurprize it by force: but being betrayed by the treachery of a certain friend of his called Baaſa, the ſonne of Machil, he died. This Baaſa taking poſſeſſion of the kingdome, exterminated all the poſterity of Jeroboam: and it came to paſſe that they of Jeroboams race that died in the City, were torn in peeces, and devoured by dogs; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey unto birds, according as Gods Prophet had pronounced. By this means the houſe of Jeroboam ſuffered a deſerved puniſhment, for their impiety and wickedneſſe.

CHAP. VI.

BUt Aſa King of Jeruſalem, was a man of upright and honeſt life, and ſuch a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprized he any thing, that had not a natural relation to piety, and the preſcript of the lawes. He corrected whatſoever was vicious and irregular in his kingdome, redreſſing whatſoever was erroneous in the ſame, and purging it from all impiety. He had an army of three hundred thouſand men of the Tribe of Juda, armed with bucklers and javelins, and two hundred and fifty thouſand of the Tribe of Benjamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After he had reigned ten years, Zaraus King of Ethiopia came out againſt him, with a great army of nine hundred thouſand footmen, and one hundred thouſand horſemen, with three hundred chariots, and deſtroyed all the land as farre as Mareſa, a Citie of Juda: in which place Aſa came and met with him, and oppoſed army againſt army in the valley of Saphath, not far from the City. Where ſeeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he beſought God that he would give him the victory and ſlaughter of divers thouſands of his enemies: for he ſaid that he came out againſt Zaraus, not aſſuring himſelf in any other thing, except onely of Gods aſſiſtance, who had the power to make an handful of men ſuperiours over many, and the feeble to overcome the mighty.

Whileſt Aſa prayed thus unto God, a certain ſign of victory was given him; ſo that he rejoyced and confirmed in that God had given him a token that he would aſſiſt him: he aſſailed his enemies, and ſlew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the reſt that were put to flight, he purſued them as far as the countrey of Gerar; and after they had conquered their enemies, they ſacked the City of Gerar, and brought from thence a great maſſe of gold, and a huge quantity of booty, with Camels, Dromedaries, and herds of divers kinds of cattel.

When Aſa and his had thus by this means obtained at Gods hands ſuch a victory, and ſo great riches, they returned back again to Jeruſalem: and when they drew near unto the Citie, the Prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who ſtayed them, and began after this manner to ſpeak unto them: That ſith they had obtained from God ſo notable a victory, they ought to behave themſelves like vertuous men, and ſuch as feared God, conforming themſelves unto his will in all things; proteſting that if they perſiſted in the ſame, God would give " them the continual victory over their enemies: and beſides that happy life: but if they forſook
" the ſervice of God, that all things would fall out contrarie unto them. That the time ſhould come, when neither true Prophet or Prieſt ſhould be found amongſt them, that ſhould in-„ ſtruct them in righteouſneſſe, when their Cities ſhould be overthrown, and their Nation „ ſhould be ſcattered over the face of the whole earth, and live like wanderers and vagabonds.
„ In the mean while therefore, while they had time, he counſelled them to live uprightly, „ wiſhing them that they would not deprive themſelves of that favour which God bare unto them. When the King and all the people heard theſe words, they were very joyful, and every one both in general and particular, were careful to ſerve God. The King alſo ſent

The year of the world, 3020. before the Nativity of Christ, 964.

Now will I return to Basa king of the multitude of Israel, who (having slain Madad the son of Jeroboam) usurped the kingdom. He made his abode in the city of Thersa, and reigned four and twenty years, shewing himself more wicked and impious, then either Jeroboam or his son had been. He plagued the people many wayes, and dishonoured God very greatly, who sent the Prophet Gimon unto him, to foretell him that his whole race should perish, and that his house should be persecuted with as many miseries as himself had inflicted on Jeroboams posterity: because that having received the government from God, he shewed himself ungrateful unto him for his goodness, and governed his people impiously and unjustly: whereas justice and piety are both profitable unto those that practise them, and well-

B pleasing unto God. Further, in that he had conformed himself in life, to the dissolute course that Jeroboam used, and was wholly contaminated with all his vices, he might assure himself that resembling him in wickedness, he should undoubtedly equal him in punishment. When Basa heard all those evils (that should shortly fall on him and his posterity, by reason of his wickedness) he redeemed not the time, neither endeavoured himself to gain the reputation of a reconciled life, or to obtain pardon at Gods hands, by repenting himself of his forepassed sins: but even as they that have a recompence proposed unto them to make them more affectionate in exploiting any thing, do diligently indeavour themselves to perform the same: so Basa, notwithstanding the Prophet had fore-told him of that which should

In the end he assembled an army, and assailed Ramoth once more, which was a great City some four leagues distant off of Jerusalem: which he took, and determined to leave a garrison therein, and fortified the same, with a resolution, from thence to make his roads into Asa's kingdome. But Asa fearing the invading of his enemy, and considering that the souldiers who were left in Ramath, did most grievously spoil all the dominions that were under him, sent Ambassadours to the King of Damasco with gold and silver, to induce him to a society in war, and to renue that amity between them, which was confirmed

Of these they burned some, and ransackt other some, amongst which were Elon, Dan, and Abellane. Which when the King of Israel understood, he gave over the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition turned to yield those of his subjects his assistance, who were utterly distracted. But Asa in the mean while builded two strong Towns, Gabath and Maspha, of that stuff which Basa had prepared to build withal. Basa afterwards (prevented by the

He was buried in the City of Arsane, and his son Ela succeeded him in his kingdome: who after he had reigned some two years, was traiterously slain by Zamri, a Captain of a half regiment of horsemen. For whilest Ela banquetted with Osa, who was the Steward of his house, Zamri wrought effectually, that he perswaded some of his horsemen to assault Ela, who at that time was alone, and destitute of men of war and Captains, for that all of them were at the siege of Gabathan, a city of the Philistines.

After that Ela was slain, Zamri took the kingdome upon him, and wholly rooted out Basa's posterity (according as the Prophet Gimon had foretold.) For after the same manner was his family utterly overthrown for their impiety, as Ieroboams progeny was extinguished for their iniquity (as we have to-fore-time declared.) For the army which besieged Gabathan, hearing news of the Kings death, and that Zamri had murthered him, and seized the kingdom, they made Amri General of the Army, and anointed him for their King: who levying the siege before Gabathan, came before the royal city of Thersa, which he besieged and took perforce. Zamri seeing the city destitute of defence, had retired himself into the most secret and retired place of the palace; where letting it on fire, he burned both himself and it, after he had reigned seven dayes. Suddenly after this, the Israelites fell at controversie amongst themselves, because that some of them sought to preferre Thaman to the kingdome, and others were wholy addicted to Amri; but they of Amries side had the better, and being of the better sort, slew Thaman, and made Amri soveraign over the people. The thirteenth yeer of Asa, Amri began his reign, and was King for twelve yeers space; six yeers governed he in Thersa, and six in Mareon (which the Greeks call Samaria) himself imposed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had given him the land on which he builded this City. He differed in nothing from the other kings his predecessors, but in that he was worser then any of them, for all of them busied their heads on this thing onely, that by daily impieties they might alien the people from God. For which cause God being displeased, caused the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguished both the posterity and name of one another. This Amri died in Samaria, and Achab his sonne was his successour.

Hereby a man may truly and easily perceive, what care the divine Majesty hath of humane affairs, and how he loveth the vertuous, and utterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Israel, through their impiety, in a short and successive course the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with all their families. But Asa (king of Jerusalem and the two Tribes) living happily in the favour of God, for his pietie and justice attained to a reverend and old age: and after he had reigned one and fourty yeers: he died a good death. And after his death, Iosaphat his sonne (whom he begat on his mother Abida) succeeded him; who in all things that concerned either pietie or fortitude, seemed to emulate and equall his grand-father David, according as it shall be declared hereafter. But Achab King of Israel made his abode in Samaria, and governed the kingdome for the space of twenty two yeers, without any alteration of those ordinances which his progenitors kings of Israel had established; but that he exceeded them daily in complotting worser wickednesses. For he imitated all their impieties and wickednesse (but especially the Apostasie of Ieroboam) for he adored those calves that were erected by him; and besides that, he added farre worse impieties then the former. He took to wife Iezabel the daughter of Ithobal king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learned to adore the gods of her nation: for she was a busie and audacious woman, and of such immeasurable madnesse, that she feared not to build a Temple in honour of Bell, the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furnished with all kind of trees, and to ordain Priests and false Prophets also, in honour of that God. The King also took delight to have these kindes of men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other kings before him in madnesse and malice. To him came a certain Prophet sent by the Almighty God, that was born in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he fore-prophecied, that neither dew nor rain should fall on the earth a long time, untill that himself, who was prepared to depart from him, should appear again unto him: and binding the same with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himself to the Southward, where he lived by a certain River, from whence he fetcht his drink: for his meat was dayly brought him by certain Crows.

Now when the river through want of rain was waxen dry, God commanded him to repair unto Sareptha (a Citie not far from Sidon and Tyre, and scituate in the midst between them both) where he should finde a widow-woman, who would furnish him with food. As soon therefore as he drew neer unto the gate, he saw a woman that lived by her labour, gathering of sticks, and God gave him to understand that it was she who should nourish him. Whereupon he came unto her and saluted her, praying her that she would bring him some water to cool his thirst; and as she was ready to depart, he called her back again, and willed her to bring him some bread also. Whereupon she swore that she had nothing in her house but an handful of flowre and a little oyl, and that she was come forth to gather sticks, to the end she might bake the same, and make bread for her self and her son, and when they had eaten the same, they must needly perish through famine, because they had not any thing more left them. Go, said the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceive better hopes, and when thou hast prepared meat for me, bring it me: for I tell thee, that thy pitcher of meal shall never fail, nor thy pot of oyl be empty, until that God send rain upon the earth. When the Prophet had spoken thus, she approached neer unto him, and performed that which he commanded, and she her self had sufficient to feed upon, and she gave the rest unto her sonne and to the Prophet: so that they wanted nothing so long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this default of rain, in the acts of Ithobal King of the Tyrians, speaking after this manner. In this time there was a season without rain, from the moneth of

A of October untill October in the next year after, but upon his supplication and request there fell great store of thunder. He builded the City of Botris in Phenicia and Auzate in Lybia. Doubtlesse he expressed hereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Ithobal raigned over the Tyrians, as Menander testifieth in his History. The woman (of whom we have spoken heretofore, that nourished the Prophet) seeing her sonne falne sick, and lying senseleſſe, as if he had been already dead, or yeelding up of the ghost; wept and brake out into such passionate laments, as were answerable to her desolate estate; and said, that the cause of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her house, and had discovered her sins, and that for the same cause her son was dead. But he recomforted her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the child unto him, assuring her that he would restore him to life.

B Now when she had brought him, he took the child and bare him into his lodging where he remained, and laid him on his bed, and cryed out unto God, saying, that he had but tenderly recompenced her that had received and nourished him, if so be her sonne should be taken from her; he therefore besought him, that he would return the soul into the body, and restore life unto the infant. Whereupon, God having compassion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might suppose that he came unto her to endamage her; he restored the child to life beyond all expectation. For which the mother gave thanks unto the Prophet, saying, that by this means she was thorowly perswaded, that God had spoken unto him. Not long after, he sought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him understand that he should have rain. At that time

C the famine raigned over the whole countrey, and there was great want of necessary victuals; so that men did not onely faint for want of bread; but the earth also for want of rain, could not bring forth that which was requisite for the sustenance of horses and other cattel. The King therefore calling Obediah unto him (who was the master of his herds) he commanded him that he should each way seek out for fountains and brooks, willing him that if he found out any grasse, he should mowe the same, and give it to his cattel for their sustenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was sought in divers places, and could not be found, he willed Obediah also to follow him. So taking both of them several wayes, the King followed one, and the master of the cattel another.

D This Obediah was a Godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and sustained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the King, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certified him, he humbled himself on his face before him. Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein he had offended him, that he would make him a Minister and Messenger unto him, who had sought to kill him, and had by-laid the countrey to apprehend him? For there was not any streight, whither he sent not some of his men to find out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they should put him to death. Now it may so be (said he) that whilest I repair unto the King, the Spirit of God wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the King not finding thee here, and frustrate of his desire, will revenge himself on my

Be thou not therefore so secure by my danger, whereas thou maiest know how careful I am of such holy men as thou art, who have delivered an hundred Prophets from Jezabels fury, and now at this time conceal and sustain them in secret places. Notwithstanding all these words, Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to cast off all fear, swearing unto him by an oath, how that day he would make himself seen and known unto Achab.

v. 17. Achab accuseth Elias of impiety.

When Obediah had certified the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him and being fraught with indignation, said unto him, Is it thou that heapest so much mischief on the Hebrews heads? art thou the man that art the cause of this sterility? To whom Elias

F replyed without flattering him any wayes, that it was he and his race that were the occasions of these mischiefs, because they had brought strange gods into their countrey, whom they adored; and had forsaken the true God, who was and is onely to be worshipped. He therefore willed him presently to assemble all the people on the mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife and her Prophets, whose number he reckoned up: the Prophets likewise of the woods, who were in number four hundred. When as therefore all of them being summoned by the King, were gathered together in that place: Elias stood up in the middest of them and said; How long will ye live thus, having both your souls and opinions dismembred and divided? For if you think that the Hebrews God is the true and onely God, why follow you him not? and why keep you not his Commandements? But if you think that the

that the people replyed nothing hereunto, he prayed them (in confirmation of that infinite and distinct power of God from that of strange gods) that whereas he was but one onely Prophet of the true God at that time present, and the other were four hundred that worshipped the false, that he might take an Ox and kill the same, and lay it upon wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the sacrifice; and that they also might do the like, and call upon their gods, and beseech them to send down fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they should do and confirm the same by miracle, that then the true nature of their gods should be known.

This counsel of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false Prophets first of all to chuse themselves an Ox, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call upon the assistance of their gods; and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and invocation was of no force, Elias began to mock them, saying, Why call you not out upon your gods with a loud voyce? for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleep. Whilest thus they had invocated from the morning untill mid-day (cutting themselves with knives and lances, according to the custome of their countrey) Elias that was to make his sacrifice, commanded the false Prophets to stand aside, willing the people to draw near unto him, and observe, for fear lest secretly he should convey fire under the wood. When the people were approached, he took twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve Tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deep trench round about the same; and afterwards heaping wood upon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commanded them to fill four tunnes with fountain-water, and to pour it upon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receive and drink up the water. Which done, he began to pray and call upon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power unto his people, who had so long time run astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heaven upon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried up. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fell down on their faces upon the earth; adoring one onely God: confessing him to be the most mighty and onely true God, and avowing that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an evil and truthlesse opinion: and laying hands themselves upon their false Prophets, they slew them by the commandment of Elias. He willed the King also to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him rain; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him down on the earth, leaning his head upon his knees: whilest thus he sate, he commanded his servant also to get up upon a certain rock, and to look toward the sea, and to tell him if he saw any clouds arise in any part (for till that time the air had been alwayes clear.) His servant having often ascended the rock, and returned him answer that he saw nothing: at length mounting up the seventh time, in descending he returned him this newes; that he saw some black appearance in the air, not much unlike to a mans footstep. When Elias understood this, he sent unto Achab, wishing him to retire himself within the City before the rain fell; who had no sooner recovered the City of Jezrael, but that the air was presently clouded and covered with a showre, and a vehement wind intermixed with rain, fell upon the earth, and the Prophet seized by the Spirit of God, ran with the Kings chariot as far as Jezrael a City of Asser. When Jezebel, Achabs wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slain her Prophets, she was sore displeased, and sent messengers unto him, threatning him in like sort to revenge her self on him, as he had slain her Prophets. Which for that Elias feared, he fled into the City of Bersabe, which is upon the borders of the Tribe of Juda, bounding upon Idumæa: in which place he left his servant, and retired himself into the desart: where, whilest he prayed God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was no better then others, for which cause he should desire to live after them: he fell asleep under a certain tree, and after that some one had awaked him, he arose and found bread and water ready prepared by him. When as therefore he had eaten and was recomforted, he went unto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses received the Laws from God) where finding out an hollow cave, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certain voice which spake unto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he remained in that place, and forsook the City? He answered, for that he had slain the Prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cause he was sought for by the Kings wife, that he might be put to death. The voice replyed again, and commanded him to shew himself openly, assuring him that he should understand that which it behoveth him to perform.

A Hereupon as ſoon as it was day, he forſook the Cave, he heard an earthquake, and ſaw a light: and after all things were appeaſed, the heavenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he ſhould in no wayes be diſcomforted with that which he ſaw: for that no one of his enemies ſhould have power to hurt him; charging him to return unto his houſe, to the intent to proclaim Jehu the ſon of Nimſi King of the people, and Azael of Damaſco King of the Syrians; certifying him that in his place, Elizeus of the city of Abela ſhould be Prophet; and that the wicked people ſhould be deſtroyed, the one by Azael, and the other by Jehu. When Elias had heard theſe things, he returned into the countrey of the Hebrews, and met Elizeus the ſon of Saphat at the cart, and with him divers others, driving before them twelve couple of oxen: him did he approach, and caſt upon him his garment, who inſtantly began thereupon to prophetize, ſo that forſaking his oxen, he B followed Elias. Yet required he him, that before his departure, he might take leave of his Parents; which licence when he had obtained, he committed them unto God, and followed Elias attending on him during all the term of his life like his diſciple and ſervant. This iſſue had the affairs of this ſo excellent a Prophet. But a certain Citizen called Naboth of the Citie of Azar, had a vineyard near unto the lands of Achab, who required him that he would ſell him the ſame, at what price he thought convenient at his own election, to the intent he might annex the ſame to his own lands, and make them all but one poſſeſſion, wiſhing him, that if he would not ſell it him for ſilver, to chuſe in exchange thereof, any one field of his that beſt liked him. Naboth anſwered him, that he would not do it, but that he intended to gather the fruit of his own land himſelf, which he had received as an inheritance from his fa- C ther. The King no leſs tormented then if he had loſt his own inheritance (in that he might not be maſter of another mans patrimony) would neither waſh nor receive any ſuſtenance. For which cauſe Jezabel his wife queſtioned with him as touching the cauſe of his diſcontent, and how it came to paſs that he neither waſht, din'd, nor ſupt: who told her of Naboths rude behaviour, and how having uſed all juſt and reaſonable compoſition unto him, in that he obtained not the thing which he requeſted at his hands. Hereupon Jezabel willed him to be of good cheer, adviſing him, that diſmiſſing his diſpleaſure, he ſhould continue his ordinary entertainment, becauſe ſhe her ſelf would take upon her to revenge him on Naboth. Whereupon ſhe preſently ſent Letters in Achabs name to the Governours of the Countrey, whereby ſhe injoyned them to celebrate a Faſt, and to aſſemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth ſhould have a ſeat prepared for him, by reaſon of his birth and no- D bilitie; willing them afterwards, that ſuborning three impudent and falſe witneſſes to depoſe againſt him, that he had blaſphemed God and the King: they ſhould by this means and for this occaſion, cauſe him to be ſtoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed according as the Queen had written, and Naboth (convinced by falſe witneſs, for ſcandalizing both God and the King) was ſtoned by the people, and put to death. When Jezabel had tidings hereof, ſhe repaired to the Kings preſence, and told him that he ſhould enjoy Naboths vineyard, and diſburſe nothing for the ſame.

But God diſpleaſed with this her wickedneſs, ſent the Prophet Elias purpoſely to meet with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him that he unjuſtly poſſeſſed the lawfull inheritance of a legitimate heir, whom he had done to death. As ſoon as the King perceived that E he came unto him, ſuppoſing it to be unſeemly for a King to be reproved, he firſt of all confeſſed his fault, and offered him to make reſtitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretell him, that in the ſame place where Naboths carcaſs was conſumed by dogs, that both his and his Queens blood ſhould be ſhed, and that all his race ſhould be deſtroyed, for that they durſt commit ſuch an impietie, and ſo wickedly ſlaughter (againſt all Law) ſo good and guiltleſs a Citizen. At length Achab upon theſe words was ſeized with diſpleaſure, and repented for the offence he had committed: ſo that apparelling himſelf in ſackcloth, and walking barefoot, he taſted not any meat, but confeſſed his ſins under hope to appeaſe Gods wrath. For which cauſe God certified him by the Prophet, that during his life-time the puniſhment of his race ſhould be deferred, becauſe he had repented him of his F miſdeeds: but that the threats and menaces ſhould take effect in his ſonnes time, all which Elias ſignified unto the King.

CHAP. VIII.

Adad King of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two several times with Achab and is overthrown by him.

1 King 20.1. ad 13. Adahs warre against Achab.

WHileſt Achabs affairs were after this manner diſpoſed, the ſon of Adad (that reigned over the Syrians, and thoſe of Damaſco) aſſembled the forces of his whole countrey, and aſſociated with himſelf two and thirty other Kings, with whom he came and made warre againſt Achab. Who being far inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battell, but cloſing up his ſouldiers in his ſtrongeſt Cities, he himſelf retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very ſtrong wall, and generally very hard to be ſurpriſed.) For which cauſe the Syrian (taking his army with him) reſorted to Samaria, and encamping before the ſame, intended to ſcale and batter the City.

The Syrians embaſſage to Achab.

But firſt of all he ſent a Herald to Achab, to require him to give audience to his Embaſſadours which he would ſend unto him, by whom he ſhould be certified what his reſolution was. As ſoon as the King of Iſrael had granted them free acceſs, the Embaſſadours came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife ſhould be at Adabs command: which if he would confeſs, and ſuffer him to ſeize ſo many as beſt liked him, he would levie the ſiege, and batter the Citie no more. Achab gave the Embaſſadours commiſſion to certifie the King of Syria, that both himſelf, and all whatſoever was his, was at his command. Upon which anſwer the King ſent a ſecond meſſage unto Achab enjoyning him the next day to admit ſuch of his ſervants as he ſhould ſend unto him, to ſearch his royal Palace, and the houſes of his friends and kinſmen, and take from thence that which was beſt liking, and in greateſt eſtimate with them, and leave the reſt with him whereof they made leaſt reckoning.

Achab amazed at this ſecond Embaſſage of the King of Syria, aſſembled his people, and certified them, that he was ready to deliver up into the enemies hands his wives and children, for their ſafetie and repoſe; and to abandon all that likewiſe which was in his poſſeſſion, (for that the Syrian had demanded no leſs at his hands in his firſt Embaſſage:) But that now he required that his ſervants might be admitted to ranſack all their houſes, to the end they may leave nothing therein that was worthy regard; willing by this means to take a pretext of making war, knowing well (ſaid he) that I will ſpare nothing that is mine for your ſafety. At this preſent he profereth and ſeeketh occaſion of hoſtilitie, propoſing unto you a thing, which is unpleaſing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithſtanding, I will do whatſoever you ſhall think good of. To this the people anſwered, that they could not endure that any of his demands ſhould be liſtned unto, or reſpected; but that the King ſhould prepare for war. Whereupon he called for the Embaſſadours and diſmiſſed them with this anſwer, That they ſhould report unto their Maſter, that Achab perſiſted in thoſe things, which of all were required by him (becauſe he had a deſire of the converſation of his ſubjects:) but as touching his ſecond demand, that he would no wayes condeſcend thereunto: and thus ſent he them away. When Adad heard this anſwer, he was ſore moved, and ſent unto Achab the third time, threatning him that his ſouldiers ſhould make a bulwark more high then the walls (he ſo much truſted in), yea, though onely each of them ſhould bring but an handfull of earth with them (which boaſt he uſed towards him to terrifie him, and to expreſs thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppoſe againſt him.) But Achab anſwered, that he ought not to glory in his Armie, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battell. When the Embaſſadours were returned back, they found the King at dinner with two and thirtie Kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achabs anſwer. Hereupon Adad gave commandment to begirt the Citie with Palliſadoes, and to raiſe bulwarks of earth, and buſily to intend the ſiege. Whileſt theſe things were in hand, Achab was grievouſly troubled, and all the people with him: but at length he grew confident, and caſt off all his fear, through the arrivall of a certain Prophet, who ſaid unto him, that God promiſed to deliver all thoſe thouſands of ſouldiers, and his boaſtfull enemies which he beheld into his hands. The ſame Prophet being afterwards demanded by him, by whoſe means this victory might be gained? He ſaid, that it ſhould be by the ſons of the Governours, whom the King himſelf ſhould lead forth, by reaſon of their unexperience. Achab therefore calling unto him the Governours ſons, found that their number amounted to two hundred thirty and two: and having notice that the Syrians intended nought elſe but pleaſure and banquetting, he opened the Citie gates, and ſent theſe young men out againſt them. Now when the Sentinels of the adverſe part had diſcovered them, they certified Adad thereof, who ſent out certain ſouldiers againſt

Now had Achab within the Citie, arranged another Army, and kept them in a readineſſe. When as therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard, and ſlain a great number of them, and had purſued the reſt even unto their own camp, Achab ſpying his preſent victory and advantage, cauſed his whole Army to break forth; who giving an unexpected charge upon the enemies, diſcomfited the Syrians (who little expected for ſuch a ſtratagem from the Hebrews) and aſſailed them diſarmed and drunken: ſo that they left both armour and weapons behind them, and fled from their camp; and their King likewiſe was ſo hotly purſued, that he ſcarcely had opportunitie to ſave himſelf by the ſwiftneſs of his horſe.

v. 20. 21. Achabs victory againſt the Syrians.

B Achab made a long chaſe in following the Syrians, and ſlaughtering them that fled; he ſpoyled their Camp likewiſe, and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantitie of gold and ſilver. He took Adads Chariots and horſes alſo, and with them returned back into the Citie.

But whereas by the advice of the ſaid Prophet, he was perſwaded to prepare and keep an army in readineſs againſt the next year (for that the Syrians were like, nay rather reſolved to charge him again) the king intermitted no preparation that concerned the war. For Adad (being eſcaped from the fight with thoſe few forces that remained after the battel) conſulted with his friends, how he might warre againſt the Iſraelites. Who adviſed him from thenceforth never more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was

C powerfull upon the mountains, and for that cauſe they had been overcome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plain, both he and his ſhould be aſſured to have the upper hand. Moreover they counſelled him, that he ſhould diſmiſſe thoſe Kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might return into his own countrey, and that in their ſtead he ſhould retain their forces, over which he ſhould ordain Chieftains; beſides (to ſupply their places that were loſt) they adviſed him to leuie horſemen and chariots thorow all his Countrey. Adab ſuppoſing that they had diſcreetly counſelled him in this matter, ordered and levied his army according as they had adviſed him. And as ſoon as the ſpring-time was come, he aſſembled his army, and led them forth againſt the Iſraelites; and arri-

But Achab with his forces (marching out to meet with him, pitched his tents and arraigned his battel near unto him although he were far inferiour both in force and number.) To him the Prophet appeared anew, telling him that God would once more have the victory to make it known that his power was not onely in the mountains (as the Syrians perſwaded themſelves) but in the Plains alſo. Thus continued both the Armies, oppoſed and incamped the one againſt the other, for the ſpace of ſix dayes. On the ſeventh, when the enemie forſook their trenches early in the morning, and placed themſelves in battell ray; Achab drew out his army and affronted them, and preſently charged them: where after a long and dangerous fight between them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them ſlain in the chace. For ſome of them were intangled with their own chariots, otherſome ſlew one another pell-mell; and ſome

E few of them found the means to flie unto their citie of Aphec, who periſhed likewiſe to the number of ſeven and twenty thouſand (being ſlain by the ruin of the walls that fell upon them) beſides one hundred thouſand men that gave up the ghoſt in that fight. But Adad attended by ſome of his faithfull friends, went and hid himſelf in a certain cave under the ground: who proteſting unto him, and concluding amongſt themſelves, that the Kings of Iſrael were courteous and mercifull, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of ſuppliants they might be attired and ſent unto him) Adad permitted them. Whereupon they incontinently preſented themſelves to Achab clothed in ſackcloth, and having their necks wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of ſupplians amongſt the F Syrians) telling him that Adad beſought his majeſtie to grant him his life; promiſing on his behalf, that from thenceforth he would alwayes continue his ſervant, and acknowledge his favour. Achab anſwered them, that it highly contented him that their king was as yet alive, and had eſcaped from the fury of the fight, offering him by them that good will & honour, which one brother ought to ſhew unto another. After this, they drew an oath from Achab, that he ſhould offer him no wrong, if ſo be he diſcovered himſelf unto him, and withal preſently reſorted unto Adad, whom they drew out of the place where he was hidden, and afterwards brought him unto Achab, who was mounted upon a chariot. Adad proſtrated himſelf before him: but Achab ſtretching out his hand, made him incontinently mount up with him into his chariot, and kiſſed him, willing him to be of good courage, aſſuring him that he ſhould receive neither injury nor injuſtice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gave him thanks, protesting that during his life-time how he would never be forgetfull of his favours: promising him mor over to restore unto him those cities which his predecessors, kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gave him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as beforetime his Ancestors had the credit to repair unto Samaria.) When these accords were made and confirmed by oath, Achab gave him many worthy presents, and sent him back into his kingdome. Thus ended the war betwixt Adad and the King of the Israelites. After this, a certain Prophet called Micheas, came unto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him upon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, he prophecied unto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods commandment, he should meet with a Lion, which should rent him in pieces. Which coming to pass, according as it was fore-told, the Prophet addressed himself again unto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound up the wound and came unto the King, telling him that he had been in warre, and had received a prisoner in charge from his Captains hands, and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) he feard lest he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he threatned no less; Achab answered him, that he was justly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discovered his head, and made it known who he was. And to this intent used the Prophet this policy. that his words might be of greater force and value. For he told the king that God would bend himself against him, because he had permitted the blasphemer Adad to depart unpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slain by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian Army. The King displeased with the liberty and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison: and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home unto his house.

Of Josaphat King of Jerusalem.

The year of the world. 3042. before Christs Nativity. 924.

HItherto have we spoken of Achabs estate: but now I must return unto Josaphat King of Jerusalem; who having inlarged his Kingdome, and planted Garisons in those Cities that were subject unto him (and in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Jeroboam reigned over the ten Tribes) the King had perpetuall assistance and favour at Gods hands, in that he was a just and vertuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more, then how he might please and honour God. The Kings his neighbours round about him, honoured him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent.

K

Josaphats pietie. 2 Chron 17. 1.

In the third yeer of his reign he assembled the Governours and Priests of his Countrey, enjoyning them to ride their circuit about the Provinces, and to teach the inhabitants of every Citie the Law of Moses, training them up in the observance thereof, and in the studie of piety. Which all the Citizens imbraced and intertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and strive the one with the other, which of them should exceed the rest in the service of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loved Josaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those Tributes which were impoted on them. And the Arabians furnished him every yeer with six hundreth and threescore lambes, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great Cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of war and arms against the enemy. He mustered in the Tribe of Juda three hundred thousand men, over whom he placed Edraus General, and two hundred thousand under the conduct of Johanan, Who besides these had two hundred thousand Archers on foot of the Tribe of Benjamin. Another Chieftain called Ochobat levied and led for the King one hundred and fourescore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which he sent into defenced cities.) He married his sonne Joram to Athalia the daughter of Achab King of the ten Tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab received him very courteously and magnificently entertained his Army with bread, wine, and flesh in all aboundance; requiring him to yield him his assistance against the King of Syria, to the intent he might recover the citie of Ramath in the countrey of Galaad, which Adabs father had won, and conquered from his father. Josaphat promised to assist him: and being no wayes inferiour unto him in force, he sent his Army from Jerusalem to Samaria. When these two Kings were departed out of the citie, and each of them were seated upon their Thrones, they distributed their pay to every one of their souldiers. At that time Josaphat commanded, that if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to give notice

CHAP. X.

Achab fighteth againſt the Syrians, and is overcome and ſlain in the battel.

HEreupon Achab called for the Prophets (who were in number four hundred) and commanded them to inquire of God, whether he would give him the victory in that battel which he enterprized againſt Adad or no, and whether he ſhould re-
B cover the Citie which he intended to beſiege? Who anſwered and counſelled him to hazard the battel, in that he ſhould have the upper hand over the Syrian, and ſhould take him priſoner as he had done before-time. Joſaphat underſtanding by their words that they were falſe prophets, asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certifie him of that which might ſucceed? Achab anſwered, that he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him, becauſe he propheſied nought elſe but miſhap and miſery unto him, and had foretold him that if he ſhould fight againſt the Syrian, he ſhould be overcome and ſlain; and for that cauſe he held him at that time in priſon, ſignifying unto him that his name was Micheas the ſonne of Imlah. Joſaphat required that
C he might be brought into his preſence, which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, that all the other Prophets had Propheſied to the King victory. But Micheas told him that it was not lawful for him to lie againſt God, but that it concerned him to ſpeak that which God ſhould inform him of, concerning the King. As ſoon as he came before Achab, and was adjured to ſpeak the truth, he ſaid, that God had ſhewed him the Iſraelites put to flight, and diſperſed by the Syrians, that purſued them no otherwiſe then ſheep without their ſhepherd. All which ſignifieth no leſſe (ſaid he) but that the reſt of the people returning home in ſafety, Achab onely ſhould be ſlain in the battel. When Micheas had ſpoken after this manner; Achab turning himſelf towards Joſaphat, ſaid unto him, I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas conſtantly avowed, that he Propheſied nothing but that which God had D commanded him to ſpeak, aſſuring Achab that he was ſollicited by the falſe prophets unto war under hope of victory, whereas he ſhould aſſuredly periſh in the battel, Theſe words of his made Achab much diſcomforted. But Sedechias one of the falſe prophets ſtepped forth, and exhorted him to ſet light by Micheas words, the rather for that he ſpake untruly. And in confirmation of this his allegation he alledged Elias, (who was a farre more skilfull Prophet in fore-telling things to come, then Micheas was) yet that the ſame Elias had foretold that the dogs ſhould lick Achabs blood in the City of Jezrael in the field of Naboth, becauſe Naboth had been ſtoned to death by the inſtance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifeſtly, that ſince he contradicted a Prophet ſo excellent as he was, he lied in ſaying that the King ſhould die within three dayes. Moreover, (ſaid he) it ſhall appear whether he be truly

For as it is to be ſuppoſed, the will of God was of ſuch power, that it cauſed the falſe prophets to triumph over the true: which was the cauſe that the falſe prophets were truſted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained will might be fulfilled. Thus marched theſe two kings with their armies againſt Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the king of Syria underſtood, he drew his Army into the field, and came out to meet with them, and encamped near unto Ramath. CHAP. I.

AS ſoon as King Joſaphat was returned back again to Jeruſalem (from the war wherein he had given ſuccour to Achab againſt Adad the King of Syria, as we have heretofore declared) the Prophet Jehu (in his return) came forth and met him, and reproved him, becauſe he had given Achab (who had been a man both impious and wicked) his aſſiſtance, aſſuring him that God was diſpleaſed with that his confederacy; yet notwithſtanding that he of his goodneſſe had delivered him from his enemies, although contrary unto his duty, he had demeaned himſelf unjuſtly. After this admonition, Joſaphat began C to celebrate ſacrifices, and to offer up thankſgivings and peace-offerings unto God: Which done, he rode in progreſſe and circuit round about thoſe countries that were under his dominion, giving order that the people ſhould be inſtructed in thoſe ordinances which were delivered from God by the hands of Moſes, and exhorted his ſubjects to the practice of piety, contained in the ſame. He planted Judges likewiſe in every citie, commanding them to execute juſtice unto the people, without reſpect of any thing but onely juſtice. He charged them likewiſe, that they ſhould not be corrupted with rewards, or ſeduced by dignity, riches, or nobility; but that they ſhould do juſtice indifferently to all men, knowing that God ſeeth all things, how ſecretly ſoever they be carried or contrived. Having in this ſort D ordered every thing in each city of the two tribes, he returned again to Jeruſalem, where he likewiſe choſe Judges from amongſt the Prieſts and Levites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to give upright and exact judgement. And if they of other cities had any cauſes of greater conſequence (which ſhould be referred to their final determination) he charged them with earneſt induſtry, to decide them with as upright and juſt meaſure as might be: for that it was very convenient that the moſt exact and accompliſhed ſentences ſhould be delivered in that city, whereas God had his Temple, and the King made his ordinary abode. Over all theſe he placed his two friends, Amaſias the Prieſt, and Zabadias of the tribe of Juda. After this manner did the King diſpoſe of his eſtate.

E About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) aſſaulted and aſſembled themſelves againſt him, and incamped themſelves near unto Engaddi (a City ſituate near unto the lake Aſphaltites, and diſtant from Jeruſalem ſome three hundred ſtounds) in which place flouriſh thoſe goodly and wholeſome Palme-trees, whence diſtilleth the pure and perfect liquour of Balme. When Joſaphat had intelligence that the enemies had paſt the lake, and were already farre entred into his countrey, he was afraid, and aſſembled the people of Jeruſalem in the Temple, and ſtanding upright, and turning his face toward the Propitiatory, he beſought and requeſted God that he would give him power and force to overcome his enemies. For ſuch had been F the forme of their ſupplication, who in times paſt builded the Temple: namely, that it might pleaſe him to fight for that city, and oppoſe himſelf againſt thoſe that durſt attempt or aſſault that place, to the intent to diſpoſſeſſe them of that countrey which he himſelf had given them in poſſeſſion; and in pronouncing this prayer he wept: and all the people likewiſe, both men, women, and children made their requeſt unto God. Preſently upon this, a certain Prophet called Jaziel aroſe up in the midſt of the Congregation, and cryed out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their prayers, and promiſed them to fight for them againſt their enemies, enjoyning them the next day to ſally out in armes, and to go and make head againſt their adverſaries, whom they ſhould encoun-

When the Prophet had ſpoken theſe words, the King and all the people proſtrated themſelves upon their faces, giving thanks unto God and adoring: mean while the Levites ſung continuall hymnes, with inſtruments and voices. About the beginning of the day, the King departed into the deſart that is under the City of Thecoa, adviſing the people to believe all that which the Prophet had ſaid unto them, and not to arrange themſelves in battel-aray: he commanded the Prieſts to march before them with their Trumpets, and the Levites that they ſhould ſing hymnes and thankſgiving unto God, as if (ſaid he) our countrey were already delivered from our enemies.

v. 16 17. The manner and weapons whereby Joſaphat overcame his enemies.

This advice of the Kings ſeemed pleaſing uuto them all; ſo that they performed whatſoever he counſelled them. But God ſent a great terrour and diſorder among the Barbarians: ſo that ſuppoſing themſelves to be enemies the one againſt the other, they ſlew one another in ſuch ſort, that of ſo huge and great an hoſt, there was not one that eſcaped. But Joſaphat looking down into the valley (wherein the enemies had pitcht their tents) and ſeeing it full of dead men, rejoyced greatly at the unexpected ſuccours that God had ſent him, who had given them the victory, not by the dint of their own ſwords, but by his providence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies campe, and to ſpoile the dead; and ſo great was the multitude of them that were ſlain, that ſcarcely they could gather the ſpoiles of them in three dayes ſpace. On the fourth day, the people aſſembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they bleſſed God for the power and ſuccours he had ſent them, by reaſon whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led back his army into Jeruſalem, and for divers dayes he ſpent the time in offering ſacrifices and making feaſts. After this diſcomfiture of his enemies was publiſhed abroad in the ears of forraign nations, they were all of them afraid, ſuppoſing that God did manifeſtly expreſſe his power, and extend his favour towards him. And from that time forwards, Joſaphat lived in great glory, in juſtice, and piety. He likewiſe was a friend to the King of Iſrael that raigned at that time, who was Achabs ſonne, with whom he adventured in a voyage by ſea, intending to traffique with certain Merchants of Tharſis, but he had great loſſe: for his ſhips were caſt away by reaſon they were over-great; and for this cauſe he had never more minde to exerciſe navigation. Hitherto have we ſpoken of Joſaphat King of Jeruſalem.

Ochozias Achabs ſonne king of Iſrael 2 King. 1 1, 2, 3, &c.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs ſonne, who raigned over Iſrael, and was reſident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and reſembled his father and mother every way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Jeroboam in wickedneſſe, who firſt fell from God, and made the Iſraelites revolt from him. The tenth year of his reign, the King of the Moabites rebelled againſt him, and denyed to pay him thoſe tributes which he was wont to pay unto Achab his father. But it came to paſſe that as Ochozias aſcended the ſtairs of his palace, he fell down from the top thereof, and being ſick of the fall, he ſent to Accaron unto the god called the Myiodis or Flie, to enquire whether he ſhould recover that ſickneſſe or no. But the God of the Hebrewes appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to go and meet thoſe meſſengers that were ſent by Ochozias, and to ask them if the people of the Iſraelites had not a God, but that the King ſent to forreign gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to return and declare unto their King, that he ſhould not eſcape that ſickneſſe. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the meſſengers of the King having underſtood that which was declared unto them, returned back again with all expedition unto him.

v. 2 3, &c. Ochozias having a grievous fall, ſeeketh to be informed of a falſe Oracle, and is reproved by Elias.

Ochozias marvelling much at their ſudden repair, asked them the cauſe thereof: who anſwered him, that a certain man came unto them, who forbad them to paſſe any further, but to ſhorten their way, to let your Majeſtie know (ſaid they) from God, that your ſickneſſe ſhall wax worſe and worſe. Hereupon the king commanded them to deſcribe what manner of man he was that ſpake theſe words unto them: who anſwered, that he was a hairy man, girded with a leathern belt. And underſtanding hereby that it was Elias, he ſent a Captain with fiftie ſouldiers unto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet priſoner unto him. This Captain that was ſent, perceiving Elias ſitting on the top of a mountain, commanded him to come down and repair unto the king, who had ſent for him; which if he performed not preſently and willingly, he threatned him to make him do it perforce. Elias anſwered and ſaid unto him, To the end thou maieſt know by thine own experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heaven, and conſume both thee and thy ſouldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell down from heaven, and conſumed both the Captain and his ſouldiers.

v. 9, 10. Ochozias ſouldiers ſent to fetch Elias, are conſumed with lightning.

When

A When the King had tidings of this losse, he was sore displeased, and sent another Captain to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatned the Prophet that if he would not willingly come down, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias praied that fire might fall from heaven, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had understood likewise how his second messenger had sped, he sent a third unto him, who being a discreet man, and courteous in condition, arriving in the place where by chance Elias was, he saluted him very courteously, and said unto him, that contrary to his own will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the Kings pleasure, he was come unto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command: He therefore required him to have compassion both of him and his souldiers, and to vouchsafe to come down, and to come after them unto the B King. Elias took pleasure in this his discreet and courteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as he came before the Kings presence, he prophecied, and told him that God said, that sith he had despised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had been no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sickness; but that he had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the successe of his sicknes: Know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophecy) he died in such manner as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Ioram succeeded him in the Kingdome, because he departed without issue.

v. 17. Ochozias dying without issue Joram his brother reigned in his stead.

This Ioram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the service of the true God, he restored strange gods. In all things else he was a man of execution. C In his time Elias was no more seen amongst men, and untill this day no man knoweth what his end was, But he left a disciple behinde him called Elizeus (as we have heretofore declared.) It is written in holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath known of their deaths. After that Ioram had taken possession of the Kingdome, he resolved to make warre upon Misa the King of the Moabites (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheep bearing wooll.) When as therefore he had assembled his forces, he sent unto Iosaphat, requiring him that sith he had been his fathers friend, he would likewise second and send his aide in his intended warre against the Moabites, who had as then newly revolted from his government. Iosaphat not onely promised him to yeeld him succours, but moreover he assured him that he would D draw the King of Idumæa (who was his subject) into their association. When Ioram understood these things by those whom he had sent unto Iosaphat, he took his army with him and repaired to Jerusalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the desart of Idumæa, and that way to charge the enemy (in that they expected nothing lesse then to be endangered on that side) these three Kings departed together from Jerusalem, namely, the King of Jerusalem, the King of Samaria, and the King of Idumæa. Now when they had marched some seven dayes journey, they found a great scarcitie of water amongst them, both to water their horses, and to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out E of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especiall Ioram, who by reason of the necessitie wherewith he was pressed, cried unto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his he would betray three such Kings as were there present, into the hands of the King of Moab without stroke strooken. But Iosaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the armie to know where there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battell, to the intent (said he) that we may understand by God what we ought to doe: and whereas one of the servants of Ioram said, that he had seen Elizeus the son of Saphat, the disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the solicitation of Iosaphat) resorted unto him. Now when they drew neer unto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the armie? and Ioram F in especiall questioned with him. To whom Elizeus answered, that he had no reason to solicite him in this sort, but to repaire unto his fathers and mothers prophets, who would certifie him the truth. Notwithstanding, Ioram intreated him that he would prophecie, and continue the preservation of the armie, and the defence of his life: but Elizeus sware by the living God, that he would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an upright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling unto them a certain man that could cunningly play upon instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilest he sung, Elizeus was ravished with a divine spirit, and enjoyned the Kings to make certain trenches in the channell of the river: for (said he) you shall see the river full of water without either wind, cloud, or rain; so that both the whole Armie and all their cattell shall be saved and and ſufficiently ſuſtained: and God will not onely beſtow theſe benefits on you, but will give G you the upper hand of your enemies alſo; and you ſhall ſurprize the faireſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of the Moabites; and you ſhall cut down their trees, ruinate their countrey, and fill up their fountains and rivers. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, the next day before Sunne-riſe the river flowed aboundantly with water: for ſome three dayes journey off, God had ſuffered a very ſtrong and ſetled raine to fall in Idumæa; ſo that both the ſouldiers and their horſes were ſufficiently refreſhed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three Kings came out againſt them, and took their way thorow the deſart, their King preſently aſſembled his armie, and commanded them to keep the paſſages of the mountaines, to the end they might hinder the enemie from entring their countrey unawares. Who beholding about the Sunne-riſe, that the water of the river was bloud-red (for at that time it aroſe in the countrey of Moab, and at this houre the water is red) they conceived a falſe opinion, H that the three Kings being preſſed by thirſt, had ſlain one another, and that the river flowed with their bloud. Being in this ſort ſeduced with this imagination, they beſought the King to give them leave to gather their enemies ſpoiles: which when they had obtained, they altogether inconſiderately marched forth as if to a prey already prepared for them, and came unto the Kings camps under hope to find no man to reſiſt them. But their hope deceived them: for their enemies environed them round about, and ſome of them were cut in pieces, the reſt turned their back and fled towards their own countrey, and the three Kings entring into the territories of the Moabites, deſtroyed their Cities, pillaged the champaine countrey, disfigured their incloſures, filling them with ſtones and mud taken out of the rivers, cut down their faireſt trees, ſtopped up the ſources of their waters, and levelled their walles with the I ground. The King of the Moabites himſelfe, ſeeing himſelfe purſued and beſieged, and that his city was in danger to be taken perforce, ſallied out very valiantly with ſeven hundreth men, hoping by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, to break thorow the Iſraelites campe on that ſide where he thought it was leaſt defenced. Which when he had attempted and could not execute, becauſe he charged on that ſide which was beſt defended, he returned back again into the city, and committed a deſperate and hatefull action: for he took his eldeſt ſonne, who ought in right to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, and ſet him on the wall of the citie, and in the ſight of all his enemies offered him for a burnt ſacrifice unto God. The Kings beholding this wofull ſpectacle, were moved with compaſſion of his neceſſitie, and overcome with humanitie and mercy, left the ſiege, and returned back again into their countries. After that K Joſaphat was returned into Jeruſalem, he enjoyed a peaceable government, but lived not long time after this exploit, but died when he was threeſcore yeers old, in the five and twentieth yeer of his reign, and was magnificently buried in Jeruſalem, according as the ſucceſſour of David's vertue and Kingdome ought to be entombed.

CHAP. II.

The year of the world, 3050. before Chriſts nativitie 914.

HE left behind him divers children, the eldeſt of whom he appointed his ſucceſſour in the Kingdome, who was called Ioram (as his uncle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs ſonne whilome King of Iſrael.) The King of the ten tribes turning back unto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whoſe actions I will here recite, becauſe they are notable and deſerve to be regiſtred in writing, according as we have gathered them out of holy Scriptures. Obedias wife (who was ſometime ſteward of Achabs houſe) came unto him and told him, that he was not ignorant that in that perſecution wherein Iezabel ſought to murther the Prophets, how her husband ſaved one hundreth of them, for whoſe private maintenance he had borrowed much money M of other men; and that now being dead, his creditors ſtrove to draw both her and her children into ſervitude: For which cauſe ſhe beſought him in conſideration of this act, to have compaſſion on her husband, and to yeeld her ſome ſuccour. Hereupon Elizeus asked her if ſhe had any thing in her houſe: who anſwered him, that ſhe had nothing but a very little oyle left her in an earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow divers empty veſſels of her neighbour: that done, he willed her to lock up her doors, and to powre oyle into the veſſels, in that it was Gods pleaſure to fill them all. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the veſſels were found full, ſo as none of them were empty: wherof when ſhe had certified the Prophet, he adviſed her to goe and

By this means Elizeus diſcharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditours intended againſt her. He admoniſhed Ioram likewiſe, by certain meſſengers, that he ſhould take heed of a certain place wherein the Syrians lay in ambuſh, intending to ſlay him: by means of which admonition the King went not out on hunting. But Adad being ſore diſpleaſed, becauſe his ambuſhment was diſcovered, began to ſuſpect his own followers: whereupon calling unto him his houſhould ſervants, he maliciouſly tearmed them traitors; and furthermore threatned them with death, for that they had diſcovereda matter, which was onely committed to their truſt, unto his enemie. Wherupon one of the aſſiſtants told him, that Elizeus adviſeth Joram to avoid Adads ambuſh, who lay in wait to kill him.

B he ought not to conceive that falſe opinion of them, neither ſuſpect that they had diſcovered his intended ambuſh to cut off his enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had diſcovered and diſcourſed all that which was intented againſt him. Whereupon he ſent out his ſouldiers with an expreſſe charge, to know in what city Elizeus made his ordinary abode: who returning back, brought him news that he remained in Dothaim: For which cauſe Adad ſent a great number of horſemen and chariots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the city by night, and laid watch round about the wals, that no man might eſcape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets ſervant had notice hereof, and was advertiſed that the enemies ſought to ſurprize Elizeus, he fearefully haſted and diſcovered their intent to his maſter, who encouraged him and commanded him to ſhake off his feare, for that he held himſelfe both ſecured and aſſured of Gods help: whereupon

At that time God hearing his prayer, preſented to the Prophets ſervants ſight, a number of chariots, and horſemen that invironed Elizeus; ſo that he laid his feare aſide, and was aſſured when he perceived theſe ſuccours. That done, Elizeus beſought God again that he would blind his enemies eies, and cauſe a thick cloud to fall upon them, to the end they might not diſcover him. Which done, he preſently thruſt himſelfe amongſt the thickeſt of his enemies, demanding of them, whom they came to ſeek for? When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Ioram to lock the gates, and to inviron the Syrians with his ſouldiers. This performed, he prayed God that he would cleare the Syrians ſight, and take away the cloud that obſcured their eies, who being delivered from their blindneſſe, perceived that they were in the midſt of their enemies. Whereat being ſore aſtonied, and uncertain whence this divine and unexpected act had befallen them, King Ioram asked the Prophet whether he ſhould kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbad him to do ſo: for (ſaid he) it is a juſt and convenient matter, that they who are taken by order of war, ſhould loſe their life, but that they had done no evill unto his countrey; but by the wals, and visited the Sentinels of the City, for feare lest any one should lie hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gave order, that if any one had such a siniſter intent, the means to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certain woman cried out unto him, Have mercy upon me, O King; he incensed with wrath, and supposing that she asked him some meat, began to raile on her, telling her that he had neither grange nor presse whereby he might any wayes supply her necessity. G

The woman answered him, that she had no need thereof, and that she was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: whereupon he commanded her to expresse and declare what she required. Hereupon she said, that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbour and friend, that sith the famine and scarcity was such, as they could finde no redresse for the same, that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another every day. As for my self (said she) I have first of all strangled mine, and we have both of us yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt us, and concealeth her childe. Ioram was grievously tormented to heare these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he devised in his heart to put him to death, because he prayed not unto God to grant him means to escape those evils that invironed them round about: so that he sent a man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himself with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the Kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house, he told them that Ioram the murtherers son sent a man to take away his head: but (said he) when as he that hath the matter in charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend and stay at the gate; for the King will follow him, and will resort to me in his own person, having altered his resolution: and they according as they were commanded, shut him out of the doors whom the King had sent. Ioram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceived against the Prophet, and fearing lest he that had the commission to murther him should speedily execute the same, hasted himselfe all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and save Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, for that he had not besought God to deliver them from those many evils which they suffered; considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnesse, they were miserably consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day (about the same houre that the King came unto him) that he should have so great aboundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicle, and a measure of flower for a sicle. By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficultie to beleeve the Prophet, because that before-time they had been ascertained by their experience of the truth of his prophecies; and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessitie and misery of the present was more patiently endured. But a certain friend of the Kings, and the Governour of the third part of his army (on whose shoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to leane) spake unto him after this manner: „ Prophet, thou tellest us incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine „ down heapes of barley and flower from heaven, so cannot that which thou speakest come „ to passe. To whom the Prophet replied: Thou thy selfe (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt pertake no part thereof. Which prediction of his had a most certain effect, according as hereafter it appeareth. L

v. 3, 4. It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie, should live without the Citie wals, for feare least their conversation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreme famine that reigned within the City) they received no relieſe or sustenance out of the same, and whether they had licence to return into the City, or whether they contained themselves in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine; decreed amongst themselves to submit themselves to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they spared them, they might live; and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with lesse torture. Now having resolved upon this deliberation amongst themselves, they repaired by night unto the enemies campe. At that time God began to terifie & trouble the Syrians, and to fill their eares with a noise of chariots and arms, as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspitious and were so moved, that they forsook their tents, and ran unto Adad, and told him that Ioram King of the Israelites had entertained the King of Egypt, and the King of the Isles for his confederates, whom he led out against them, and how already they had heard the noise of them that approached to bid them M

A the battel. Adad (whose ears were filled with no less rumor then those of the people) was amated and amazed at their sayings: so that all of them abandoned their camp, their horses, beasts of carriage, & riches, & betook them to flight with disorder and confusion. Those Lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies camp (and of whom we have heretofore made some mention) being near unto the Camp, perceived that there was great silence in the same, and no less aboundance of all things: for which cause approaching the same, and entering into a Tent, they found no body therein: for which cause they fell to eating and drinking, and that done, to bear away a quantitie of rayment and gold which they hid without the Camp. Afterward resorting to another Tent, they bare away likewise that which

B was therein, and did the like by four others without any encountry or contradiction of any man: and conjecturing thereby that the enemies were retired, they began to accuse themselves, because they had not given notice thereof to Joram, and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cause drawing neer unto the walls of the Citie, they cried out unto the watch, giving them to understand in what estate they had found the enemies camp, who signified no less to Jorams guard, so that at last it came unto his ears. Whereupon he presently sent for his friends and captains, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him suspect some stratagem or ambush: for they (said he) having lost their hope to surprize us by famine, are retired under an intent, that when we shall issue and fall a spoyling of their camp,

C they may come upon us, and kill us; and afterwards take our citie without any stroke stricken. For which cause (said he) I advise you to keep good guard within the citie, and let this retreat of our enemies make us the more co siderate. Some one of his counsell praysed this this advice of his, and allowed his foresight, advising him to send out two scouts upon horsback to search every quarter betwixt that and Jordan, to the end, that if they should be taken and slain by the enemies ambushment, their fall might be a president to the whole army to stand upon their guard (for fear lest they should be surprized in like manner urging this for a conclusion, that the loss of two horsemen should not be very great, since perhaps they might otherwise have been cut off by famine. This advice of his was allowed by the King, and ratified by his assistants: so that presently there were two Spies sent out, who rode along without encountering any enemy; but they met with great quantitie of victuals, and arms,

D cast away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away the more lightly. Which when the King understood, he suffered the people to issue out, and spoile the camp, who recovered things of no small value therein, but much gold and silver, and troupes of all sorts of cattell: and besides that, they found so great a quantitie of wheat and barley, that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they delivered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was so great quantity of corn, that two measures of barley were sold but for one sicle, and a measure of wheat-flower for a sicle; according as Elizeus had prophecied. Now the measure which we call Sat, containeth an Italian bushell and the half. But the Captain of the third part of the Army, was he onely that enjoyed no part of this benefit; for being appointed by the King to have the keeping

E of the gate, and to restrain the multitude from headlong pressing out, for fear lest thrusting one another, some of them should be trodden underfoot and slain, he himself was trodden, upon and slain (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he onely amongst the rest would not give credit to that which he had said, as touching the great abundance of victuals that shonld happen.

When Adad King of the Syrians was safely returned to Damasco, and knew that God had suffered such a confusion and fear to fall both on him and his Army, and that it had not happened by reason that the enemy sallied out upon him; he was sore discouraged to see that God was so displeased with him, and through anguish and agony of mind fell sick: And for that (at that very time) Elizeus was come unto Damasco; Adad understanding thereof, sent Azael

F (who was one of his most trusty servants) unto him, to present him, and consult with him upon his sickness, whether he should recover or no.

Hereupon Azael loaded fourty Camels with the most fairest and most honourablest presents, that either Damasco, or the Princes royall Court afforded; and repairing to Elizeus, saluted him very courteously, telling him that he was sent unto him by King Adad, first of all to present him, and afterwards to ask counsell of him as touching his malady, whether he might easily be healed. The Prophet commanding the messenger to carry no evil tidings unto the King, did notwithstanding tell him that he should die. Azael hearing thereof was sore grieved, and Elizeus himself began to weep, so that the tears fell from his eyes aboundantly, in that he foresaw how many evils the people should suffer after the decease of Adad. weep (ſaid he) for the compaſſion that I have of the people of Iſrael, by reaſon of thoſe calamities which they ſhall endure by thy means. For thou ſhalt kill the better ſort of them, and ſhalt burn their ſtrongeſt cities: thou ſhalt murther their Infants, and daſh them againſt the ſtones, and ſhalt open the womens wombs that are with childe. Azael anſwered, What force is there in me to execute theſe things? Elizeus ſaid unto him, that God had certified him that he ſhould be King of Syria. When Azael was returned back unto Adad, he ſignified nothing unto him but glad tidings, as touching his ſickneſs: but the next day he caſt a wet net upon him and ſtrangled him, and ſeized the Kingdome into his own hands. This Prince was a man of execution, and well beloved among the Syrians, and common people of Damaſco, who even untill this day honour Adad and Azael his ſucceſſour as gods, by reaſon of their benefits and thoſe Temples which were builded by them, which adorn the citie of Damaſco. For every day do they celebrate feaſts in memory of theſe Kings, and honour of them, by reaſon of their antiquitie, not knowing that they were modern, and ſuch as reigned not paſt eleven hundreth yeers ſince. But Joram King of Iſrael hearing of the death of Adad, began to give over his fear, and caſt off that ſuſpition which he had conceived of him, rejoycing that yet at laſt he might have libertie to live in peace. The other Joram King of Jeruſalem (for he likewiſe was ſo called, as we have heretofore declared) by murthering of his brethren and his fathers friends, who were Governours, obtained the Kingdome, and became ſo wicked and impious, as he differed in nothing from the Kings of Iſrael, who tranſgreſſed the firſt lawes and ordinances of the Hebrews, and perverted the ſervice of God. For Athalia Achabs daughter his wife taught him to execute divers miſchiefs, and amongſt the reſt to adore ſtrange gods. This notwithſtanding, God would not altogether aboliſh his race, by reaſon of his promiſe made unto David: yet intermitted he not daily to introduce new impieties; and ſoil the ancient lawes of his forefathers with new corruptions. Mean while, it came to paſs that the Idumæans revolted and ſlew their King, who had been before time ſubject unto Joſaphat Jorams father, and in his place eſtabliſhed another to their own liking. For which cauſe Joram invaded Idumæa by night with his horſes and chariots, and ſpoyled the countrey round about his Kingdome, without paſſing any farther: yet profited he nothing in ſo doing; for all of them revolted from him, and amongſt the reſt the inhabitants of the countrey of Labina.

But ſo great was the fury of this man, that he conſtrained the people to aſcend the high mountains, and adore ſtrange gods. Yet whileſt he behaved himſelf in this manner, and utterly rooted out of his thought the lawes of his forefathers, there was a letter brought unto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified him that God would do great juſtice upon him, becauſe he had forſaken the wayes of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the Kings of Iſrael, conſtraining the Tribe of Juda and the inhabitants of Jeruſalem to forſake the pure ſervice of their God, to ſerve Idols, as Achab had conſtrained the Iſraelites to do: Furthermore, becauſe he had murthered his brethren, and ſlain upright and vertuous men. The Prophet likewiſe certified him by letters, what puniſhment he ſhould endure, namely, the ruine of his people, the death of his wives and children, and laſtly his own death: which ſhould happen unto him by a ſickneſs in his belly, wherewith he ſhould be ſo tormented, that his entrails ſtrangely rotting within him, ſhould drop out of his belly, and that he himſelf ſhould ſee his miſery, which ſhould be ſuch as neither might be recovered by medicine, or ſhould ever leave him untill he had finiſhed his dayes. But Iehu marched on softly and in goodly array, till Ioram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did? who instead of answer, reviled him bitterly, and called him the son of a poysoner and of a harlot. For which cause Ioram (fearing his turbulent spirit, & suspecting lest he hammered upon some sinister intent) turned his back, and fled away as swiftly as his Chariot could be driven; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprized by treason: but Iehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Ioram instantly fell upon his knees, and died. Hereupon Iehu commanded Badac (who governed the third part of his army) to cast Iorams body into Naboths field, remembring him of the Prophecy of Elias foretold by him to Achab, who murthered Naboth: namely, that he and his race should die in that field. For sitting behind Achabs Chariot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophecied. When Ioram was faln down, Ochozias was afraid to be slain: for which cause he turned his Chariot to take another way, hoping that Iehu would not discover him. But he was pursued and overtaken in a certain steepy way, and was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forsooke his Chariot, and being mounted upon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had been searched and dressed some few daies, he deceased, and was carried to Jerusalem and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and surpassed his father in wickednesse.

(This did he under a colour to sound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the Governours and Tutors had received these letters, they were afraid, and made account that they could prevail nothing against him, who had prevailed already against two mighty Kings. A thereof. Which done, he iſſued out as ſoon as it was day, to ſee them; and beholding them, he began to tell thoſe, that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily armed himſelf againſt his maſter, and ſlew him: but as touching thoſe whom they ſaw there, he had no wayes laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men ſhould know, that all that which hapned unto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God, and that his houſe was deſtroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had ſlain and diſpatched both theſe and all thoſe that were found to be of Achabs race amongſt the Iſraelites, he went unto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias houſhold ſervants (who was King of Jeruſalem) he asked them whither they went? who anſwered him, that they went to ſalute Joram and their King Ochozias, (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them ſlain.) Hereupon Jehu commanded his ſervants to lay hands on them, and put them to the ſword, notwithſtanding, B they were fourty two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Jonadab (who in times paſt had been his ancient friend) who embracing him, prayſed his forwardneſs, in that he had performed all things according to the will of God, in aboliſhing Achabs houſe. Jehu cauſed him to mount up with him in his Chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him that he ſhould well perceive, that he would ſpare no one wicked man, but would puniſh all the falſe prophets, and tellers of lies, and abuſers of the people, who had made them forſake the true ſervice of God, and adore ſtrange gods: becauſe the moſt laudable and allowed ſpectacle that might encounter a good mans eye, was to ſee the puniſhment of the wicked. Jonadab perſwaded by theſe words, mounted up into his Chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Jehu had ſought out Achabs kindred, he put them to death: C and intending that no one of his falſe prophets and prieſts ſhould eſcape his hands, he aſſembled them together by a ſubtill policy. For gathering the people together, he proteſted that he would have twice as many gods as Achab had had: willing that all the Prieſts and Miniſters that belonged unto them, ſhould preſent themſelves, for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent ſacrifices to Achabs gods; proteſting that whatſoever Prieſt ſhould be abſent, he ſhould loſe his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Having in this ſort aſſigned a day wherein he would offer ſacrifice, he ſent thorow all the countrey of Iſrael, charging all Baals prieſts to repair unto him, and commanding that each of them might have their veſtments given them. As ſoon as they were apparelled, he reſorted to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Jonadab, and commanded that a ſearch ſhould be D made amongſt them, to eſpie whether any one of contrary qualitie or condition were medled with them; for that he intended that no ſtranger ſhould be amongſt the Prieſts. When as therefore he underſtood that none but the Prieſts were in that aſſembly, even at ſuch time as they began to offer ſacrifice, he cauſed them to be incloſed by foureſcore ſouldiers (whom he eſteemed to be moſt truſty) whom he commanded to kill the falſe Prophets, and to puniſh them according to the cuſtome of their forefathers, which had already too long time been neglected; dreadfully threatning all thoſe, who ſhould any wayes intermit to root out the name and memory of theſe wretches out of the world. They therefore ſlew all theſe Prieſts, and invironed the Kings Palace; and in ſo doing cleared Samaria of forrain gods. This E Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a Temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he aſſigned prieſts, and honoured him with all ſorts of ſacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Jehu ſuffered the Iſraelites to adore golden calves. When this execution was performed in puniſhing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Jehu by his Prophet, that his children ſhould obtain the Kingdome of Iſrael to the fourth generation. This was Jehues eſtate.

Athalia reigned five yeers in Jeruſalem: and after ſhe was ſlain by the high Prieſt Joas is proclaimed King.

F ATHalia Achabs daughter, hearing news of the death of her brother Joram, and her ſonne Ochozias, together with the utter ruine of all the royall poſterity, bethought her ſelf to extinguiſh Davids memory, and in ſuch ſort to root it out that no one of that line ſhould remain alive to enjoy the Kingdome hereafter: which when ſhe had concluded in her heart, ſhe began to put it in execution. Yet notwithſtanding, one of Ochozias ſons eſcaped her bloody hands, by this means that inſueth. Ochozias had a ſiſter by his fathers ſide, whoſe name was Joſabetha, who was married to Joiada the high Prieſt; who entring into the Kings Palace, and finding Joas at that time but one yeer of age, hidden with his nurſe among the dead, ſhe took both him and his nurſe, and locked them up in a clozet within the Temple, where Ioiada her husband and ſhe did G ſecretly nouriſh them for the ſpace of five yeers, during which time Athalia reigned in Jeruſalem over the two Tribes.

The year of the world, 3060. before the Nativity of Christ, 904.

About the ſeventh yeer, Ioiada entred into diſcourſe with five Centurions, and perſwaded them to oppoſe themſelves with mutual conſent againſt Athalias proceedings, and to aſſure the Kingdome to little Joas. Whereupon giving and receiving faithfull promiſes of ſecrecy the one unto the other, they confidently addreſſed themſelves to execute their intended purpoſes after this manner. They whom the high Prieſt had choſen to execute this Act, went thorow all the Countrey; and gathered the Prieſts and Levites together, with all the Governours of the Tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Jeruſalem to the high Prieſt, who made them ſwear an oath, that they would keep ſecret that which he H ſhould enforme them of, as a thing that required ſilence, and men of execution to perform the ſame. As ſoon as he had aſſured them by oath, he brought forth the little child whom he had nouriſhed (who was of Davids line) and ſaid unto them: Behold your King, who is of that race, which (as you know) was choſen by God to reign over you for ever: I therefore think it fit that the third part of your guard ſhall keep him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the ſame. Another company ſhal have the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the reſt of the people, let them remain diſarmed within the Temple, and ſuffer no armed man to enter thereinto, except the Prieſt one-ly. He appointed alſo another company of Prieſts and Levites to be about the King, with Javelins and drawn ſwords, charging them that whoſoever durſt be ſo bold to enter the I Temple armed, they ſhould preſently put him to the ſword; and laying all fear aſide, to attend the ſafety and guard of the Kings perſon. They being obedient to that which the high Prieſt had commanded them, in effect expreſſed their redineſs: whereupon Ioiada opening the Arcenall, (which in times paſt was prepared by David) diſtributed amongſt the Centurions, Levites and Prieſts, all the javelins, quivers, and all other ſort of armes that were therein, and diſpoſed all them that were armed, round about the people, joyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entering in amongſt them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the Infant Ioas into the midſt of the company, they ſet the royall Crown on his head, and Ioiada, after he had anointed him with oyle, proclaimed him King: whereupon all the K people rejoyced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God ſave the King.

v. 13. ad finem.

Athalia hearing this noiſe and applauſe, beyond all hope was greatly troubled, and with thoſe ſouldiers which ſhe had about her, ſhe haſtily iſſued out of the Palace, and arriving in the Temple, the Prieſts admitted her: as for the reſt of the men of warre that followed her, they that by the high Prieſts ordinance circuited the Temple, would not ſuffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia ſaw the childe ſtanding before the Tabernacle with the royal Crown on his head, ſhe rent her garments, and ſtorming through deſpite, ſhe cried out and commanded that the Traitor ſhould be ſlain, that had thus betrayed her, and ſought to diſpoſſeſs her of her Kingdome. But Ioiada called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out unto the brook Cedron, and there to kill her (becauſe he would not permit L that the Temple ſhould be defiled with her curſed blood.) Moreover he charged them, that if any one ſhould attempt to reſcue her, they ſhould kill them likewiſe. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) took her, and led her without the gates of the Kings Mules, and there ſlew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Ioiada aſſembled the people, and the men of warre in the Temple, binding them all by an Oath, to yeeld the King their faithful ſervice, and to procure the proſperitie, and increaſe of his Kingdome. Secondly, he made the King ſwear in like manner, that he would maintain the ſer-vice of God, and in no manner diſannul Moſes lawes. That done, they ran unto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Ioram had built to the diſhonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and levelled it with the ground, and put to death their high Prieſt called Mathan. The charge, and guard of the Temple, Ioiada committed to M the Prieſts and Levites, according to the order eſtabliſht by David, with commandement twice a day to offer their ordinary burnt offerings, and conſequently to make perfumes, according to the Law. He appointed alſo certain of the Levites to be porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no unclean thing ſhould enter the ſame uneſpied: and after he had ordained theſe things, with the Centurions and Governours, and with all the people, he took Ioas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace, and having placed him in the royal Throne, all the people cried, God ſave the King, and banquetted and feaſted for divers dayes. Thus after the death of Athalia the citie was in quiet. Ioas was ſeven yeers old at ſuch time as he was made King, his mother was called Sabia, and was of the town

Azael King of Damaſco levyeth an army, and firſt of all aſſaulteth the Iſraelites, and after marcheth forward againſt Ieruſalem.

B But Azael King of Syria making warre againſt the Iſraelites and againſt their King Iehu, deſtroyed the countrey on the other ſide of Jordan, and all the Eaſterne tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manaſſites. Furthermore, he burnt and ſpoiled Galaad, and Bathanæa, violenting and outraging all thoſe that he met withall. For Iehu went not out againſt him to reſiſt him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a deſpiſer of pietie, and his lawes) he died after he had reigned ſeven and twentie yeers over the Iſraelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Ioas his ſonne to ſucceed him in his Kingdome. But Ioas King of Ieruſalem conceived a certaine deſire to renew the Temple: for which cauſe, calling unto him Ioiada the high Prieſt, he commanded him to ſend thorow all the countrey the Levites and Prieſts, and to levie upon every one of their heads half a ſicle of ſilver for the building and reparation of the Temple, which was falne to decay in Ioram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the high Prieſt C would not obey him herein, knowing well that no man would willingly diſburſe money. But in the three and twentieth yeer of his reign, the King ſent both for Ioiada, and the Levites alſo, and expoſtulated with them for diſobeying his commandment, enjoyning them from that time forth to provide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the high Prieſt uſed preſent diſpatch in levying the money, wherewith the people were highly contented. He therefore made a cheſt of wood cloſed on every ſide (except that on the upper lid thereof, there was a little crannie left open) which he placed neer unto the Altar, commanding that every one ſhould offer according to his devotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranny into the coffer, to be imployed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people ſhewed themſelves affectionate: ſo that they gathered together a great quantitie of gold and D ſilver, with great zeale; and when the coffer was filled, it was emptied, and the account thereof taken and ſumm'd up by the Secretary, and high Prieſt in the Kings preſence, and afterwards was brought together into one aſſigned place: which order was obſerved every day. And when as it was ſuppoſed that there was ſufficient money gathered, the high Prieſt Ioiada and King Ioas hired Maſons, and Carpenters, and prepared great beames of excellent Timber.

After that the Temple was repaired, they imployed the remainder of gold and ſilver (which was of no ſmall quantitie) to make cups, pots, and veſſels, and other utenſils: and every day offered they ſacrifice of great value upon the Altar, and this cuſtome was continued ſo long as Ioiada lived. But after his deceaſe (which happened in the hundred and E thirtieth yeere of his age, after he had lived a juſt and upright life, and was interred in the ſepulcher of David in Jeruſalem, becauſe he had eſtabliſhed the Kingdome in Davids poſteritie) King Ioas had no more care to ſerve God, and with him the reſt of the Governours of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the lawes and ordinances, which they knew were very convenient for them. For which cauſe God being provoked by this change, and incenſed againſt the King and the reſt, ſent his Prophets unto them, to proteſt, to expoſtulate with them for their offences, and to withdraw them from their iniquitie. But they purſued ſinne the more vehemently; ſo that neither the puniſhments, by which they, who had offended God before-times, had been plagued, with all their poſteritie; neither all the advertiſements given them by the Prophets, could induce them F to amend: or to forſake thoſe ſinnes wherein they were engaged: but that which is worſt, King Ioas ſtoned Zachary, Joiadas ſonne, and put him to death in the Temple, forgetting himſelfe moſt ungratefully of the benefits he had received by his father. And the occaſion was, for that Zachary having received a charge from God to prophecy, came into the midſt of the people, and counſelled both them and him to follow juſtice, foretelling them that they ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed except they did beleeve. This Zachary did at his death call God to witneſſe and judge of thoſe calamities he endured, in dying grievouſly and violently for the good counſell which he had given them, and the benefits which his father had in times paſt done unto Ioas. But many dayes paſſed not, before the King suffered due punishment for these misdeeds. For Azael King of the Syrians invaded his countrey, and after he had first of all ruinated Girta, he marched forwards with an intent to besiege him at last in Jerusalem. Ioas desperate of all succours, emptied all the treasures of God, and those of the Kings, and took away the presents that were hung up in the Temple, and sent them to the Syrian, redeeming the siege by this meanes, lest he should be drawn into hazard to lose all. The Syrian pacified with such and so great riches, and aboundant treasure, suffered not his army to passe to Jerusalem. After this, Ioas was seized with a grievous sickness, and (to the intent that the death of Zachary the sonne of Ioiada might not escape unrevenged) his friends conspired against him, and he dyed by their hands. He was entombed in Jerusalem, but not in the sepulcher of his ancestors, because he had falne from God: He lived seven and fourtie yeers.

CHAP. IX.

Amasias King of Ierusalem made warre against the Idumæans and Amalechites, and obtained the victorie.

2 King. 14. 1. ad 15. Amasias King of Ierusalem.

AMasias his sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome. But in the 21. yeer of Ioas reign, Ioachas, the sonne of Iehu, took possession of the Kingdome of Israel in Samaria, and was seized thereof for the space of seventeen yeers. But he followed not his fathers steeps, but rather behaving himself impiously, according as his predecessors in the Kingdome, and contemners of God had done: For which cause the King of Syria subdued him, and cut off a great part of his dominions, and took his greatest cities from him, and defeated his armies: so that at length he had but ten thousand footmen, and five hundred horseman. All which hapned to the Israelites (according to the prophecie of Elizeus, which he foretold unto Azael, at such time as he prophecied unto him, that he should reign over the Syrians, and them of Damasco, after that he had murthered his master. Ioachas being in this extremitie, had his recourse to God in prayer and supplication, beseeching him that it might please him to deliver him from the hands of Azael, and not suffer him to be under subjection and thraldome unto him.

God (that respecteth the repentant, as if they had been innocent, and that gently checketh those whom he might utterly exterminate, if he so pleased) gave him assurance against the warre and danger, so that the countrey (having obtained peace) recovered presently her former estate and prosperitie. When Ioachas was dead, his sonne succeeded him in the government, and began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, in the 37. yeer of Ioas King of Juda. (For this King of Israel was called Ioas, as well as he that reigned in Jerusalem:) he governed the Kingdome sixteene yeers. He was a good man, and had no correspondence with his father in disposition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell sicke: to him resorted the King of Israel to visit him, and finding him in the extremitie, and past hope of recovery, he began to weepe and lament himself, calling him his father, and his armour, because that during his life, he had never occasion to use the sword against the enemy; but that by meanes of his prediction he had alwaies the upper hand of them without stroke striking: that now he departed this life, and left him disarmed to the mercy of the Syrians, and other his enemies; so that he had neither securitie of libertie, nor life, but that he rather wished to die with him, then to live in those dangers.

Joas King of Israel and Samaria.

Elizeus being moved with these complaints, comforted the King that lamented in this sort, and commanding him to draw his bowe that he had brought with him (for the King had bent the same) Elizeus said unto him, Draw: and he shot three arrowes, and gave over at the fourth. Oh said Elizeus if thou hadst shot more arrowes, thou hadst utterly ruinated the Kingdome of the Syrians: and sith thou hast contented thy self with three shoots onely, thou shalt overthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou shalt fight against them, and shalt recover the countrey they have taken from thy father. After the King understood these things, he departed, (and not long after the Prophet died) who was renowned for his justice, and manifestly beloved of God, who shewed miraculous and incredible works by his prophecies, and such and so worthy as the Hebrews ought to keep them in perpetuall remembrance, and was buried magnificently, according as it behoved a man, who was so highly favoured by God as himself.

AMASIAS making war againſt JOAS King of Iſrael, is overcome.

B THe tenth year of the reign of Ioas King of Iſrael, Amaſias reigned over the Tribe of Juda in Ieruſalem: his mother was called Judah, and was a citizen of Ieruſalem. He was wondrouſly careful to maintain juſtice (notwithſtanding he was very young.) And having taken upon him the government of the kingdom, he reſolved with himſelf, that he ought firſt of all to revenge the death of his father Ioas, who was traiterouſly ſlain by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them all to the ſword (yet extended he not his diſpleaſure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the laws of Moſes; which ſaith, that it is not lawful to puniſh the children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards levied an army of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, and choſe the men that were in their flowring years, and about twenty years of age: the number of whom C amounted to three hundred thouſand men, whom he divided into Centuries. He ſent alſo to the King of Iſrael, and waged a hundred thouſand of his armed men for a hundred talents of ſilver, becauſe he intended to make war upon the Amalechites, Idumæans, and Gabelites. Now whileſt he made this preparation, and was in a readineſs to undertake this exploit; a certain Prophet counſelled him to diſmiſs the Iſraelites that he had with him, becauſe they had no piety in them, ſignifying unto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that war, he ſhould be overcome: and contrariwiſe, that he ſhould have the upper hand over his enemies if he fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Hereupon the King was ſore moved (becauſe he had already paid the Iſraelites their wages) but the Prophet ceaſed not to exhort him to do that which was pleaſant in Gods ſight, who would D give him ſilver in abundance. For this cauſe he diſmiſſed them, telling them that he freely gave them their pay; and he with the forces of his kingdom marched out againſt thoſe Nations, and fought with them, and overcame them, and ſlew ten thouſand of them, and took no leſs number of priſoners alive (whom he afterwards cauſed to be led to a high rock that bounded upon Arabia, and from thence caſt them down headlong) and from all theſe Nations he recovered a great booty, and brought home much riches.

Amaſias victory over the Amalechites.

Whileſt Amaſias ſtood upon theſe termes, the Iſraelites (that had taken wages of him, and were caſhiered by him) conceived a diſpleaſure againſt him, ſuppoſing themſelves to be injured by him, as if he had diſmiſſed them for men of ſmall reſolution. For which cauſe they invaded his countrey, and ſpoiled it as far as Bethſemer, and carried away a great quan- E tity of cattel, and ſlew three thouſand men. This victory and proſperity made Amaſias proud, ſo that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof, and continued the honour of thoſe gods which he brought from the countrey of the Amalechites. For which cauſe a Prophet came unto him and ſaid, that he wondred that he ſhould eſteem them for gods, who had ſo little availed them who honoured them, and had delivered them into his hands; ſo that divers of them were put to death, and divers led away priſoners, which they themſelves had brought unto Jeruſalem, according to the cuſtome of war. Theſe words moved the King unto diſpleaſure, ſo that he commanded the Prophet to ſilence, threatning him to puniſh him, if he entermedled with his affairs any more. Who anſwered him, that he would no further urge him, yet withal he fore-prophecied unto him, that God would not ſuffer this F his innovation to reſt unpuniſhed. Anon after, Amaſias (not able to keep a moderation amidſt his affiance & proſperity: but waxing more inſolent againſt almighty God, by whom he poſſeſſed the bleſſings he enjoyed) in height of his pride wrote to Ioas King of Iſrael, commanding him & his to yeeld him homage, according as in times paſt the Iſraelites were ſubject to David and Solomon; threatning him, that if he refuſed to do him voluntary ſervice, he would enforce him to decide the difference by arms: to whom the Iſraelite replied thus: King Ioas to King Amaſias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres tree of great height, to whom a little thiſtle wrote, demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his ſon. But during this interparlee betwixt thē, there came a certain wild beaſt, that troad down the thiſtle. Let this example admoniſh and diſſwade thee from attempting of two mighty matters, neither growing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, lest through thy presumption thou expose both thy wife and fortune to the uncertain hazzard of warre. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more whetted unto warre (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore he had drawn his army into the field, and both the armies were upon the point to wage the battell, a sudden fear and discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias army turn their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceived) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Ioas threaten that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Jerusalem to open their gates, and to receive both him and his armie into the City, he would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessity and fear of death) wrought so much as his enemies were received into Jerusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; and there-thorow Amasias was led captive into Jerusalem. In this manner Ioas was made master of the City, who afterwards carried away the Treasures of the Temple, and took away the gold and silver that Amasias had in his Palace: and having in this sort ransomed him from captivity, he returned back again into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth yeer of the reign of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the city of Lachis, to avoid the conspiracy of his domestic all friends, by whom notwithstanding he was surprised, and slain by them that were sent to do the deed: his body was brought and royally intombed in Jerusalem. Thus died Amasias for introducing invocations in contempt of God; he lived fifty foure yeers, and reigned twenty and nine: his sonne Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

BUt in the fifteenth yeer of the reign of Amasias, Ieroboam, Ioas sonne, began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, and enjoyed the Kingdome for the space of fourty yeers. This King dishonoured God, and offended him grievously in observance of Idols, and divers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped ten thousand mischiefes and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certain Prophet called Ionas, who prophecied unto him, that he should make warre against the Syrians, and that he should overcome them, and enlarge his kingdome to the Northward, as farre as the City of Amatha; and to the Southward as farre as the lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the countrey of Canaan, according as the Generall Iosuah had confined them.) Ieroboam encouraged by this prophecy led forth his army against the Syrians, and spoiled all their countrey (according to the prophecy of Jonas.) And for that I have promised to yeeld an exact history in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, me thinks it shall not be amiss to declare that, which I have found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man being commanded by God to repair unto the kingdome of Ninus, and proclaime that which should happen to the City of Ninivie (namely, that the government thereof should be abolished:) through feare which he conceived repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a Citie called Joppa; where finding a ship, he entred the same and sailed towards Tharsis in Cicilia. But there arose so vehement a tempest upon the sea, that the vessel was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master, and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thanksgiving unto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Jonas hid himself, and covered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waves incensed by violent winds, increased more and more; the Mariners and passengers began to imagine amongst themselves, that some one of them in the Barke had caused that tempest: whereupon they agreed amongst themselves to cast lots, to know which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fell upon Ionas: who being demanded whence he was, and for what businesse he travelled, answered them, that he was an Hebrew by Nation, and a Prophet of the most high God; and counselled them, that if they would be warranted from that danger, they should cast him into the sea, because it was he onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not perform that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impiety, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had been committed to their trust. But for that the storm more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little

B fourtie yeers, departed this life, and was intombed in Samaria, and Zachary his ſonne ſucceeded him in his Kingdome. At the ſame time, Ozias the ſonne of Amaſias reigned in Jeruſalem over the two tribes, after that Ieroboam had already reigned foureteene yeers; his mother was called Achia, and was of the Citie of Jeruſalem. He was a man of a good nature, and ſuch a one as loved juſtice, of noble courage, and very laborious in providing for all occurrences: he made warre againſt the Philiſtines, and after that he had overcome them in battell, he tooke Ita, and Amnia, two of their ſtrong Forts, and raced them. This exploit done, he ſet upon the Arabians that neighboured upon Egypt, and after that (having built a citie upon the red Sea) he planted a garriſon therein. He afterwards diſcomfited the Ammonites, conſtraining them to pay him tribute, and ſubdued all as farre as the marſhes of E-C gypt. After that, he began to provide for the Citie of Jeruſalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the walles thereof, that had been beaten downe or decayed, either by continuance of time, or by negligence of thoſe Kings who were his predeceſſors: he repaired thoſe alſo which the King of Iſrael had beaten downe, at ſuch time as having taken Amaſias priſoner, he rode in triumph into the Citie. Beſides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fiftie cubits high. Theſe incloſed he with walles to ſet garriſons therein, and in divers barren places he cauſed divers fountaine heads to be made: for he had an in-D finite multitude of beaſts of carriage and other cattell, in that the countrey was fit for paſture. He tooke pleaſure alſo in tillage, for which cauſe he was often buſied about his land, ſowing, and planting the ſame. He had about him a choſen army, to the number of three hundred and ſeventie thouſand fighting men, whoſe Generals, Conductors, and Captaines, were valiant and invincible men, and were in number two thouſand.

He taught his ſouldiers to march in a ſquare battell (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with ſwords, targets, and corſelets of braſſe, with arrowes and darts. He made alſo great preparation of divers engins to batter Cities, and to ſhoot ſtones and darts, beſides divers hookes, and other ſuch like inſtruments. But whileſt he was intent on theſe ſtudies and preparations, he grew inſolent and proud, and being puffed up with mortall arrogance, he contemned the immortall force, which endureth for ever (which is pietie towards God, and the obſervation of his commandements.) So that upon a certaine ſolemne feaſt day wherein all the people were aſſembled together, he attired himſelfe in the high Prieſts veſtments, and entred into the Temple to offer ſacrifice unto God upon the golden Altar; which notwithſtanding the high Prieſt Azarias (accompanied with foureſcore Prieſts) inhibited him the ſame, telling him that it was not lawfull for him to ſacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in thoſe that were of the poſteritie of the high Prieſt Aaron.

F a great trembliug and earth-quake, and the Temple cleft in twaine, and a great light of the Sunne entred thereinto, and reflected on the Kings face in ſuch manner, that all his body was inſtantly covered with a leproſie, and before the Citie (in a place called Eroge) the half of a mountain (that ſtood to the Eaſtward) brake and fell, and rowled and removed for the ſpace of foure ſtadia, towards the Orientall mountain, where it reſted: ſo that the publike waies were ſhut up, and choaked, and the Kings gardens of pleaſure were wholly ruinated and diſfigured. When the Prieſts beheld the Kings face covered with a leproſie, they told him what inconvenience had hapned unto him, and enjoyned him to depart out of the towne, according to the cuſtome of men that were polluted. Zachary, Ieroboams sonne, having reigned sixe moneths over the Israelites, was slaine by Treason complotted against him by a familiar friend of his called Sellum, the sonne of Iabes, who possessing the Kingdome after him, enjoyed not the same above thirtie daies. For the Generall Manahem, being at that time in the Citie of Tharsa, and understanding of that which had hapned to Zachary, departed thence with all his force, and came to Samaria, and in a battell which he fought, he slew Sellum: And afterwards obtaining the Crowne, he went from thence towards the Citie of Tapsa, the inhabitants whereof locked and barred their gates against him, and would not receive him: in revenge whereof he spoiled all the countrey round about, and tooke the Citie by force, and (being highly incensed against the Tapsians for their insolence) he put them all to the sword, not sparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous crueltie in him.) Manahem raigned in this manner for the space of ten yeares, continuing a most cruell and unbridled tyranny over the people. Afterwards being assailed by Phul King of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither practised to resist him, but procured his peace for the sum of a thousand talents of silver, which in way of composition he paid unto him. The people furnished Manahem with this summe, in way of contribution, paying fiftie drachmes apiece.

Anon after he died, and was buried in Samaria, leaving behind him, a sonne to succeed him in the Kingdome, whose name was Phaceias, who imitating his fathers crueltie, possessed the Soveraigntie by two yeares: for he was slaine at a feast in the midst of his friends, by a Treason practised against him by Phaceias the sonne of Romelias, who injoyed the Kingdome for the space of 20. yeares, addicting himselfe to all impietie and wickednesse. But Teglaphalasser King of Assyria, led forth his army against the Israelites, and spoiled all the countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Jordan, and Galilee, Cydida and Asor also, and led all the inhabitants thereof prisoners, and transported the Kingdome to himselfe. This is that which wee have thought good to write as touching the King of Assyria.

Phaceias. The translation of the Israelites.

Iotham the sonne of Ozias reigned in Jerusalem over the tribe of Iuda: he was the sonne of a daughter of Ierusalem called Iereſa. There was no vertue deficient in this King, for he was devout towards God, just towards men, and carefull to repaire the Citie: for he willingly imployed himself in restoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built galleries and porches about the Temple, and repaired the walles that were falne downe: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he restored all that which was deficient in his Kingdome. He made warre upon the Ammonites, and overcomming them in battell, he made all their nation tributary, and constrained them to pay him yearely a hundred talents, and ten thousand Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his Kingdome in such sort increased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the same time there lived a certaine Prophet called Naum, who prophecied the overthrow of the Assyrians, and of the Citie of Ninive, and spake to this effect. All the people thereof shall be tossed „ and troubled, and be put to flight; and shall say the one unto the other: Stay and abide, take „ gold and silver, and there shall be none that will receive it. For they shall have more care to „ save their bodies, then their goods: for there shall be a great debate amongst them with lamentation: their members shall lose their vigour, and their faces shall be altogether swart through feare: where shall the repaire of Lions be? or where shall the mother of Lions whelpe rest her? Ninive (God saith unto thee) I will destroy thee, neither shall the Lions that issue from thee, governe the world any more. To this effect did he prophecy, and spake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeate. For I have omitted it purposely, because I would not be troublesome to the Readers. But all those things which he foretspoke as touching Ninive, came to passe one hundred and fiftene yeers after. But this is sufficient for the manifestation of this matter.

Rasin King of Damasco maketh war against Jerusalem: Achaz sendeth for the King of Assyria to assist him.

Hedio & Rufinus chap. 23.

AFter that Jothan had lived one and fourty years, and reigned sixteen, he died, and was buried in the sepulchre of the Kings; after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his son, who was a contemner of God, and a transgressour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himself to the customes of the kings of Israel: for he B erected Altars in the City of Jerusalem, and sacrificed unto Idols, offering up his own son unto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated divers such like offences. During these impious Idolatries of his, Rasin king of Syria and Damasco, and Phaceias king of Israel made war against him (for these two were confederates:) leading therefore both their armies against Jerusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reason the wals were very strong. But the king of Syria having seized the City of Elath, near unto the Red-Sea, and slain all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garrisons likewise to the sword, and all the Jews round about, and carried away with him a great booty unto Damaso, and afterwards returned home with his army. The king of Jerusalem understanding that the Syrians were retired, and supposing C himself to be sufficient to fight against the king of Israel, led forth his forces against him, and was overcome in battel (because that God was incensed against him for his wickednesses, which were both detestable and infinite.) For in that battel the Isralites slew about sixscore thousand men: amongst whom was Zacharias the son of Achiaz, whom the General of the army of the Israelites called Amias slew, with Ericam the Governour of the whole Realme, and he took Elcan the General of the tribe of Juda prisoner also. They led away likewise a great number of women and children, with a great booty, and afterwards returned to Samaria. At that time there was a certain Prophet living in Samaria, whose name was Obel, who coming out to meet the army, cryed with a loud voyce unto the people, that the victory which they had, did not happen unto them through their valour, but by reason of the wrath of God conceived against Achaz king of Juda. He further reproved D them, for that not contenting themselves with the good hap of that victory, they had so far presumed as to hold them of Juda and Benjamin prisoners, who were of their own alliance: he therefore counselled them to send them back unto their houses, without any injury by unjustice offered unto them, threatning them that if they did the contrary, they might be assured that God would punish them.

After this admonition, the Israelites assembled themselves together to consult upon this matter, at which time Barachias, one of the principal Governours of the state, and three others with him alleadged, that it was not lawful for the Citizens to lead their prisoners into the city, for fear (as they said) that God should utterly extinguish them all. For those sins (said they) which we have already committed, and against which the Prophets have exclaimed, are cause enough to incense God; so that we have no cause to annex new impieties to the E precedent. When the souldiers heard these words, they permitted them to execute all that which they held convenient to be done. For which cause the above-named took the prisoners, and discharged them, and entertained them curteously, and gave them means and money to furnish them in their journey, and sent them home without offence: and besides that, these four persons conducted them onwards of their journey as far as Jericho, and when they drew near unto Jerusalem, they returned back to Samaria.

and spoyling Syria, and sacking Damasco, he slew Rases their King also, and transported them of Damasco into the higher Media, and sent certain people of Assyria into Damasco. He wrought much mischief likewise in the country of Israel, & led a way a great number of prisoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been subdued and weakned after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and silver that was in the Kings treasury, and in the Temple of God, and carried it unto Damasco, and gave it to the King of Assyria, according to those promises he had made him, and after much gratuity and thinkigiving, he returned back again to Jerusalem.

Achaz death

This King was so senseless and ignorant of his own profit, that although he was overpressed by war by the Syrians, yet ceased he not to adore their gods, but persisted in their honour, as if he expected the victory by their means. And although he were overcome again, yet intended he the honour of the Assyrian gods; choosing rather to reverence any then the true God, whom his forefathers worshipped: yea, so far grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true piety, that at length he shut up the Temple gates, and prohibited the ordinary sacrifices, having before that taken all the precious presents out of the same. After he had in this sort committed these outrages against God, he died when he was thirty and six years old; and after he had reigned sixteen years, and left his son Ezechias to succeed him in the kingdome. At that very time died Phaceias King of the Israelites, by the means of a certain conspiracy, which Oseas his intended friend wrought against him: who held the kingdome for the space of nine years, shewing himself both to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Against him Salmanasar King of Assyria moved war, and overcame him, because God was not favourable unto him, neither assistant in his enterprizes: he was therefore subdued, and constrained to pay a certain tribute imposed upon him. The fourth year of the reign of Oseas, Ezechias the son of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Jerusalem, reigned over the two tribes. He was a man of a virtuous disposition and one that loved justice and piety; for as soon as he came unto the kingdome, he resolved with himself first of all, that the chiefest and most necessary and most profitable thing that might be, was the establishment of the service of God. When as therefore he assembled the people, the Priests, and the Levites, he began to discourse and devise with them in these or such like words. There is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irreverent regard and service towards God, ye are faln into many and mighty calamities, because through „ your extreame madnesse, you have suffered your selves to be perswaded to adore those, „ whom he esteemed to be no gods. Since therefore you have learnt (to your own misery) „ how pernicious a thing impiety is, I exhort you, that (forgetting the same) you purifie „ both your selves, your Priests, and your Levites from your former pollutions, that yet at „ length you may assemble together, and open the Temple, and cleanse the same with ordi- „ nary sacrifices, to the end it may be restored to the ancient honour which earst it possessed: „ for by this means we shall have God favourable unto us, when his wrath shall be appeased „ that was kindled against us. As soon as the King had spoken after this manner; the Priests opened the Temple, and after they had gathered the sacred vessels, and cast all uncleanesse out of the same, they offered sacrifice upon the Altar, according to the custome. Afterwards the King sent to all the Provinces under his dominion, and gathered together the people of Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread (which had been intermitted a long time through the impiety of the Kings his predecessours.) He sent also unto the Israelites, exhorting them to forsake the customes which of long time they had wickedly observed, and to return to the true and ancient manner of serving God, certifying them that he would permit them to repair to Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread, promising them that he himself would solemnize the same with them also; protesting that he did this, not in respect of his own profit, but through the desire he had to further their felicity, who should be happy, if they obeyed this his counsel.

The Word of God is never without fruit.

When Ezechias Ambassadours came unto the Israelites, and had delivered unto them the message that they had in charge: so far were they from conformitie, that they mocked them, and esteemed them to be mad, and spit upon those Prophets that exhorted them to piety, and foretold them the evils they should suffer, unlesse they subscribed to the service of God; and finally they laid hold on them, and put them to the sword. And not contenting themselves with this presumption, they attempted yet far worser things, and never gave over until that God (in punishment of their impietie) made them subjects under the hand of their enemies, as shall appear manifestly hereafter: But divers of the tribes of Manasses, Zabulon, and Issachar respecting the good counsels of the Prophets) submitted themselves to the service of God, and repaired altogether to Jerusalem to King Ezechias to honour God. As soon

A soon as they were arrived there, Ezechias ascended into the Temple, accompanied with the governours and all the people, and offered there seven Bulls, seven Rams, and as many Goats: and after that he and all the governours had laid their hands upon the heads of the sacrifice, they delivered them to the Priest, according as it appertained to them, and they sacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Levites also (assisting round about with instruments of musick) sung Hymns and Songs unto God, according as they had been taught by the ordinance of David. The other Priests had Trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their Hymns. Which done, the King and all the people cast themselves prostrate upon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards sacrificed seven oxen, a hundred sheep, and two hundred lambs. The King likewise bestowed six hundred oxen,

B and three thousand sheep upon the people to feast withall. And when as the Priests had joyfully performed all things (according to the custome contained in the Law) the King took great pleasure and banquetted with the people, giving thanks unto God. And when the feast of unleavened bread was come, they sacrificed the Passeover, and during the seven other dayes, they offered up their other sacrifices. The King gave in way of gratuity unto the people (besides that which had been offered) two thousand oxen, and seven thousand sheep. The Governours did the like, and gave the people a thousand bulls, and one thousand four hundred sheep: and thus was the feast solemnized, which had not been so magnificently and devoutly celebrated since Solomons time. When the solemnity of this feast was past, they journeyed and went thorow the country, and purified it. They purged the

C City likewise of all uncleanness of Idols, and the King ordained that the daily sacrifices should be made according to the Law, upon his charge. He enacted also that the people should pay the tenths to the Priests and Levites, with the first fruits, to the intent they might wholly intend piety, and never estrange themselves from the service of God. By which means it came to pass, that the people brought all kind of fruit to the Priests and Levites: which the King put up in certain store-houses, which he had built, to be distributed to every one of them, their wives and children, and by this means they returned again to their former purity in religion. After the King had disposed all things in this sort, he made war upon the Philistines, and overcame them, and seized all their Cities (between Gaza and Geth.) About this time the King of Assyria sent unto him, and threatned him, that if he would not pay them

D those tributes which his father before him had paid unto him, he would destroy all his country. Nevertheless Ezechias set light by his threats, assuring himself in that piety and zeal he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Esay, by whom he was exactly instructed as touching all those things that were to succeed. And for this present it shall suffice that we have spoken thus much of this King.

SALMANASER slaieth the King of Israel, and leadeth the Israelites captive into the country of Media.

WHen tydings was brought to Salmanasar King of Assyria, that the King of Israel had privily sent unto Soan King of Egypt, to request his assistance in warre against the Assyrians, he was sore displeased, and drew forth his army against Samaria, in the seventh year of the reign of Oseas. But the King of Israel withstood his entrance into the City, by which means he was besieged therein for three years space, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth year of Oseas, and the seventh of Ezechias reign. At which time all the kingdom of Israel was destroyed, and all the people transported into the countries of Media, and Persia; and amongst the rest King Oseas was taken prisoner. The King of Assyria caused certain Nations of a Country, which

F (by reason it abutteth upon a certain river in Persia called by that name) was called Chut, to remove their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabit the Country of Israel. As for the ten tribes of Israel, they were transported out of their Country, (nine hundred fourty seven years, since their predecessors (departing out of Egypt) possessed the Country of Canaan; eight hundred years after the government of Josuah; and two hundred and fourty years, seven moneths, and seven dayes, since they revolted from Roboam, Davids nephew, to give the kingdom to Jeroboam.) This was the end of the Israelites, who transgressed the laws, and disobeyed the Prophets, who foretold them of that calamity which should happen unto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The sedition that they moved against Roboam, establishing his servant for their King, was the original of their mis-mischiefs. For Ieroboam committing impiety against God, and they imitating his wickedness, prevailed so much, as the Majestie of God grew displeased with them, so that he punished them according as they deserved. But the King of Assyria ravaged and spoiled all Syria and Phœnicia with his army, and his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for he made war against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulat reigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greek tongue. The King Elulat (saith he) reigned six and thirty years and pursued the Cutheans that were revolted from him by Sea, and made them subject. Against whom the King of Assyria sent forth his army, and invaded all Phœnicia, and afterwards having covenanted a peace with them, he returned back again the Cities of Sydon, Arce, and Paletyr, and divers other Cities revolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselves to the King of Assyria.

The Tyrians Chronicles touching the wars of Sulmanazar against the Tyrians, written by Menander.

For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his army forth once more against them; and he was furnished by the Phœnicians with sixty ships, and eight hundred rowers. The Tyrians charging their ships with twelve of their vessels, overthrew the Navie of the Assyrians, and took about five hundred men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the King of Assyria returning back again, planted a garrison upon the river, and fortified the fountain heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of five years) they were inforced to finde and dig new fountains to sustain themselves.

These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselves, as also the exploits of the King of Assyria against them. But these Chutheans from the Region of Chutt, which is in Persia, (where there is a River of that name) for that they were in five nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honoured in their nation, to the number of five gods, whom they served after the manner of their countrey. Whereupon the true and supreme God was grievously displeased, and provoked against them: for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could finde no remedy, until such time as they had notice that it behoved them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safety. They therefore sent unto the King of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in war. Which done, they learning the law, and the manner of Gods service by them, began very diligently to observe both: by which means the plague ceased suddenly. And now even unto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrews Chutheans, and Samaritans by the Greeks. These as often as they find the Jews in prosperity, call them their cousins (according to the variety and changes of time) but if they perceive their fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abjure they consanguinity, and renounce any lawful parentage or amity, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawn thither from a forrain Nation. But in time and place convenient, we will speak of them more amply.

Gods displeasure against the idolatrous Chuthites.

The Chutheans embrace the service of God, and in prosperity claim kinred of the Jews.

CHAP. I.

Senacherib King of Aſſyria, beſiegeth Ezechias in Jeruſalem.

B IN the fourteenth yeer of the reign of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacherib King of Aſſyria drew forth a huge Army againſt him, and ſurprized all the Cities of Juda and Benjamin by ſtrong hand. To him Ezechias ſent Embaſſadors, promiſing him obedience, and ſuch a tribute, as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe. When Senacherib had heard and conſidered upon the Embaſſadors inſtructions, he reſolved on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promiſing that he would depart in peace, as ſoon as he had received three hundreth talents of ſilver, and thirty talents of gold: ſwearing an oath unto the Embaſſadors, that under theſe conditions he would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giving credit to theſe words of his, emptied the treaſuries, and ſent the C prefixed ſumme to Senacherib, hoping to be delivered from his enemie, and the hazard wherein his countrey ſtood. But the Aſſyrians having received the money, ſet light by their promiſes, ſo that Senacherib went in perſon to make war againſt the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rapſaces his Generall in Judæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeſt Minions and Courtiers, with commiſſion to ſpoil Jeruſalem: The names of theſe two were Tharata and Anachares. As ſoon as they were incamped neer unto the walls, they ſent unto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and ſpeak with them: but he through fear which he had conceived, went not unto them, but ſent three of his moſt familiar friends, Eliacim the ſuperintendent of his Realm, Sobna, and Joachus that had the Commiſſion of his Regiſters. " Theſe three preſented themſelves before the Chieftains of the Aſſyrian ar-D " my: whom when Rapſaces had beheld, he commanded them to return unto their Maſter, " and to tell him that the great King Senacherib was deſirous to know under what hope he " thus neglected his government, and obſtinately refuſed to obey him, and refuſe his army " into the Cities? Is it perhaps, becauſe he hopeth the Egyptians will have the upper hand of " the Kings army? If that be his hope, doubtleſs he is deceived, ſhewing himſelf to be like " unto a man that ſtayeth himſelf upon a broken reede; by which he is not only not ſuſtain- " ed, but in his fall alſo; hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewiſe wiſhed him to conceive, " that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times paſt hath " given them the victory over the Iſraelites; ſo now alſo is pleaſed to humble Ezechias, and to " make both him and his ſubjects ſtoop under the Aſſyrian government. Whileſt Rapſaces E. " ſpake thus in the Hebrew language (wherein he was very skilful) Eliacim (fearing leſt the " multitude ſhould be ſtricken with fear upon the hearing of theſe words) beſought him to " ſpeak in the Syriack tongue. But he ſufficiently inſtructed what it was that he feared, an- " ſwered him with a louder voice in the Hebrew tongue, and told them they ought to give " ear unto the Kings commandment, and to yield themſelves to his mercy, becauſe it con- " cerned their ſecuritie. I am not ignorant (ſaid he) that both you and your King do perſwade " the people under a vain hope, and fraudulently allure, them to bear arms againſt us. But if " your valour be ought at all, and you ſuppoſe that you can levie the ſiege from your walls, " I am ready to furniſh you with two thouſand horſe, give you us ſo many horſemen to ap- F " prove their valours: but you cannot give them that you have not. Why therefore delay " you? why yield you not to thoſe that are too ſtrong for you? and are able even in ſpight of " your reſiſtance to ranſack your cities? whereas you know that a willing ſubmiſſion is alwaies " ſecure: contrariwiſe whereas dutie is enforced, there wanteth no perill of calamity.

When both the Embaſſadours and the people had heard that which the Aſſyrian had ſpoken, they reported the ſame to Ezechias, who incontinently caſt his royal garments off, and clothed himſelf in ſackcloth, carrying the countenance of a diſconſolate man; and caſting himſelf proſtrate upon the earth after the manner of their countrey, he beſought God to be aſſiſtant unto him, ſince all other hope was vain. He ſent alſo certain of his friends, and ſome Prieſts unto the Prophet Eſay, requiring him to pray unto God, that ſince the ſacrifice was offered unto him for publicke ſecuritie, it might pleaſe him to fruſtrate the enemies hopes, and to have pitie and compaſſion on his people. When the Prophet had performed G no leſs then he required, he received an anſwer from God, by which he aſſured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies ſhould be overcome without ſtroke ſtrucken, and ſhould retire with ſhame, and not with that advantage which they brag'd of at this preſent, becauſe God had already determined how they ſhould be à v.20,ad finem overthrown. He foreprophecied alſo that Senacharib himſelf (the King of Aſſyria) ſhould fail of his enterprize in Egypt, and that upon his return to his own Court, he ſhould be ſlain. At that very time the Aſſyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in wh ch he called him fool and mad man, to think that he could warrantize himſelf fro n being his ſlave, yea his in eſpeciall, who had conquered divers and farre greater nations: threatning him with utter ruine at ſuch time as he ſhould ſurprize the Citie, If he opened not the gates of Jeruſalem H willingly, to entertain his army. When Ezechias had read theſe Letters, he ſet light by them, by reaſon of the confidence he had in God: and having opened them, he ſpread them in the Temple. And whileſt he renewed his prayers unto God for the ſalvation of the Citie and his ſubjects, Eſay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewiſe they ſhould manure their lands in peace and ſecuritie, and ſhould enjoy their poſſeſ-ſions without fear. Not long after, the King of Aſſyria having but cold ſucceſs in his expedition againſt Egypt, turned back again without doing any thing, for this cauſe that en-ſueth. He had loſt much time in the ſiege of Peluſium: and at ſuch time as he had already raiſed certain Bulwarks as high as the wall, ſo that he wanted nothing but to give the aſſault; news was brought him that Tharſices King of Ethiopia brought an army to reſcue the E- I gyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the deſart, and ſuddenly to charge the Aſſyrian army. Senacharib troubled with theſe tidings, ſpeedily departed thence with his

of God, he fell ſick of a grievous diſeaſe, ſo as the Phyſicians diſpaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This ſickneſſe of his was accompanied with a grievous care, becauſe he had no children, and ſaw that he was now to fore in this ſort tovled with diſcontents, he lamented and beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to lengthen his life a little time, untill he had children to ſucceed him, and that he would vouchſafe that his ſoul might not be taken from him, before he were the father

A of a ſonne. Hereupon God taking compaſſion of him (and the rather, becauſe he was not grieved for that the pleaſures of his Kingdome were taken from him; but for that he ſought for a lawfull heir to ſucceed him in the Princedome) he ſent the Prophet Eſay unto him, to aſſure him, that after three dayes he ſhould be recovered of his ſickneſſe, and that after he had lived ſome fifteen yeers more, he ſhould depart out of this life, and leave a lawfull heir behinde him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought theſe tidings to the King, he doubted both the unexpected meſſenger, and the mightineſſe of his deſeaſe: for which cauſe he required ſome prodigious ſigne at Eſaias hands, to the intent that he might certainly beleeve, that he was ſent as a meſſenger from God unto him: for the truth of thoſe things, which either exceed our hope, or reaſon, are wont to be confirmed by theſe means. Whereupon Eſay asked him what ſigne he required, and it ſhould be given

B him. For which cauſe he requeſted, that ſince the declining ſunne had already advanced his ſhadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cauſe it to return unto the place where it was before, and overrun again the ſame lines of ſhadow. On this occaſion the Prophet beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to confirm the King by this miracle: who ſeeing that which he deſired, was ſuddenly delivered from his ſickneſſe, and aſcended the Temple to worſhip and praiſe God. At that time it happened, that the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was deſtroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will ſpeak in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon ſent an Embaſſadour to Ezekias with preſents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiving his meſſengers, willingly feaſted them, and ſhewed them his treaſures, his arcenal,

C and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious ſtones: and after he had given them preſents for Balad, he diſmiſſed them. Whereupon the Prophet Eſay came unto him, asking him from whence thoſe Embaſſadors came? To whom Ezekias anſwered, that they were of Babylon, and came unto him from their King, telling the Prophet how he had ſhewed them all that which he had, to the end that having ſeen and obſerved his riches and power, they might afterwards certifie the King thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replyed, ſaying: Know thou, that within a little time thy riches ſhall be tranſported into Babylon, and thy children ſhall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) ſhall be ſlaves unto the King of Babylon. All which God gave him to underſtand before it happened. For which cauſe Ezekias was ſore troubled, to hear theſe tidings, ſaying, That he deſired that his people might not fall into thoſe miſeries: but ſince it was impoſſible to change the decree of God,

D he required that he might have peace during his life time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Beroſus maketh mention. This Prophet truly divine, and admirable for the verity of his prophecies, is accounted to have ſpoken nothing that was untrue, but to have left in writing all that which he prophecied: the truth whereof hath afterwards in effect appeared to poſterity. Neither did he alone perform thus much; but beſides him, twelve others have done the like: and all that which is hapned unto us, either good or evill, hath falne out truly according to their prophecies. But hereafter we will ſpeak of every one of them. Now when as Ezekias had lived his prefixed time (according as we have fore-ſpoken) and governed his Kingdome in peace, he died when he was fiftie four yeers old, and in the nine and twentieth yeer of his reigne.

The Kings of Chaldæa and Babylon warre againſt Manaſſes, and take him priſoner.

HIs ſonne Manaſſes (the ſonne of Achiba, a woman born in Jeruſalem) ſucceeded him in the Kingdome. This man forſook his fathers wayes, and followed ſiniſter cuſtomes, expreſſing in his manners all kinds of miſchief, not omitting any impietie, but addicting himſelf to all the iniquities of the Iſraelites, who were deſtroyed becauſe of their ſinnes committed againſt God. He was ſo impudent,

F as he ſpared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the Citie and the whole countrey: for making his entry, in deſpite of God, he ſlew afterwards all thoſe that were vertuous men amongſt the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets; yet ſo it is, that he killed every day ſome: ſo that Jeruſalem was overflown with bloud. For which cauſe God being provoked unto wrath by theſe his ſo hainous offences, ſent divers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatned to inflict the ſame calamities upon them, which (for contempt of religion) the Iſraelites their brethren had a little before that ſuffered. But they unwilling to give truſt to theſe ſpeeches of theirs (whoſe admonitions had they reſpected, they might have avoided their imminent evils) at length in effect experimented the truth thereof. For whereas they persevered in their accustomed G and dissolute manners, God incensed the King of Chaldæa and Babylon against them; who sending his army into Judæa, and spoiling the whole region, at length surprised and led away Manasses prisoner, and made him subject to what punishment it should please them to inflict upon him. At last the wretch (taught by his own mischief) acknowledged his sinne, and humbly besought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy courteous and mercifull: neither did God shew himself inexorable; but having compassion on his miseries, gave eare unto him; and after some space of time, the Babylonian sending him home, restored him to his former government. As soon as he was returned back to Jerusalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to shew the fruits of repentance, and to fear God in all things, cleansing his spirit of all those sinnes, whereunto before-time he was addicted. He purged the Temple also, and cleansed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himself wholly to think how he H might give God thanks, for that he had thus retyred him from ruine, and how he might passe all the remnant of his life in his favour. He taught the people likewise to do the like, telling them what miseries they had endured within a few yeers, for that they had demeaned themselves impiously. He repaired the Altar also, and according to Moses prescript offered thereon solemne sacrifices: and after that he had purveyed those things that concerned the service of God, as it appertained; he bethought himself likewise of the securitie of the citie of Jerusalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined walls, annexing also another inclosure thereunto, and erecting high Towers likewise, furnishing the same with munition and victuall sufficient for a Citie of defence. And so much was he changed during the rest of his life, that he was held most happy; and after that time he began to serve God, divers took example of vertue by imitating him. After he had lived sixtie and seven yeers, he died in the I five and fiftieth yeer of his reigne, and was buried in his garden. His Kingdome came into the hands of his sonne Amos, the sonne of Emalsema, of the citie of Jabath; who imitating his fathers youthly course, was slain in his own house, by a conspiracie plotted by his own household servants, after he had accomplished the yeers of four and twenty, and reigned two. After his death the people slew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the Kingdome was given to his sonne Iosias, who was onely eight yeers old.

IOsias mother was of the city of Bosceth, and was called Ieda: he was a man of a good nature, and of his own instinct inclined to vertue, conforming himself to the customes and manners of his progenitor David, both in the scope and rule of all his life. When he grew to be twelve yeers old, he gave manifest approbation of his pietie and justice: for he drew the people to a conformable course of life, and to the detestation and abolishing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the service of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And considering the actions of his predecessours, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no lesse circumspection, then if he had been an old man; and that which he found to be correspondent and advitedly done by them, L that did he both maintain and imitate. All these things did he both by reason of his innated wisedome, as also by the admonishments and counsels of the Elders: for following orderly the laws (both in respect of publique policy, as also in religion) he walked uprightly, in that by observing them, he could not erre. For circuiting both the citie and the whole countrey, the King razed down and defaced the woods that were made for strange gods, and overthrew their altars: and all those gifts that had been offered unto them by his predecessours, were defaced in a mockerie: and in this manner caused he the people to return to the service of God, and to forsake the honour they did unto Idols. He offered likewise the ordinarie sacrifices and burnt offerings upon the Altar, and established Judges and Magistrates to determine publike debates, and to do each man right; charging them to have no lesse respect M

He sent also thorow all the countrey, commanding that all those that would be contributors, either in gold or silver, towards the reparation of the Temple, should bring in their benevolence according to their wills, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, he appointed superintendents, both over the Temple, as also over the charges that were defraied in the reparation thereof: namely, Amasias, who was alreadie Governour of the Citie, and Saphen the Secretary, and Ioata Committee over the Regisiters, with the high Priest Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence provided workmen, and all that which was requisite for the building, and began the work. This ſudden and ſpeedy reparation of the Temple gave a manifeſt teſtimonie of the Kings piety: who when he had attained to the eighteenth yeer of his age ſent Elcia the high Prieſt, and cauſed him to melt down the remainder of the money that was given towards the building of the Temple, & to make veſſells, cups, and ewers for the ſervice ſervice of the Altar. He commanded alſo, that all the gold and ſilver that was in the Treaſury ſhould be brought forth and employed after the like manner in cups and other veſſels. Now whileſt the high Prieſt ſearched the treaſurie, he found the ſacred books of Moſes in the Temple, which he brought and delivered the ſcribe Saphan; who after he had peruſed the ſame, preſented them unto the King, giving him to underſtand that all that which he had commanded, was accompliſhed: beſides that, he read the books unto him, which when the King had heard; he rent his clothes, and called Elcia the high Prieſt unto him, and the ſcribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends, and ſent them unto the Propheteſſe Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignity, and famous by reaſon of his nobility: commanding them that when they came unto her, they ſhould endeavour to appeaſe Gods wrath, and labour to recover his favours, becauſe it was to be feared, that by reaſon that their anceſtors had tranſgreſſed the Laws of Moſes, they ſhould be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of their countrey: and abandoned by all men, ſhould at length periſh miſerably.

When the Propheteſſe had heard the Kings commandment, ſhe willed thoſe that were ſent unto her to return unto the King, and to certifie him from her, that God had given a ſentence againſt them, which might not be revoked, by any prayers whatſoever; namely, that ſince they had tranſgreſſed the law of Moſes, the people ſhould periſh, and ſhould be caſt out of their countrey, and deprived of all their goods that they had, and for that they have not grown to amendment in ſo long time; notwithſtanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, and had foretold the puniſhment of their impieties, which ſhould happen unto them, to the end that they might beleeve that God is God, and that he fails not in any thing that he hath fore-told by his Prophets. Furthermore ſhe ſaid, that he forbore as yet to ſend theſe afflictions upon them, for Joſias ſake, who was a vertuous man: but that after his deceaſe God would powre his intended puniſhments upon the people. This prophecy of the woman they ſignified unto the King: who ſent into all parts, and aſſembled the people in Jeruſalem, commanding the Prieſts and Levites, and generally all men without diſtinction of age, or perſon to be preſent in that convention. Now when they were aſſembled, he firſt of all cauſed the ſacred books to be read, and afterwards ſtanding aloft upon his Throne, he cauſed all the people to ſwear and promiſe that they ſhould ſerve God and keep Moſes laws. Whereupon all of them did willingly approve whatſoever he ſaid promiſing to do that whereunto they were exhorted. And therewithall offering up preſent ſacrifices unto God, they beſought him to ſhew himſelf favourable and mercifull towards them. The King likewiſe commanded the high Prieſt, that if there were any neceſſary in the Temple which were made by his predeceſſours, in honour of idols and ſtrange gods, he ſhould caſt it out. And after that a great quantity was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the aſhes afterwards were ſcattered here and there. And as touching the Prieſts (that appertained to idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When theſe thing were thus executed in Jeruſalem, he came afterwards to the plain countrey; and all that which Ieroboam had erected there in honour of idols, he utterly defaced it, and the bones of the falſe Prophets were burnt upon the Altar that Jeroboam had builded: This had the Prophet foretold that came to Jeroboam at ſuch time as he offered ſacrifice, and told him in the preſence of all the people, all that which ſhould happen: namely that one of Davids poſterity called Ioſias, ſhould do thoſe above-named things: which prophecy took effect three hundreth ſixty and one yeer after. After this, King Ioſias tranſported himſelf to the Iſraelites (who had avoided the captivity and ſervitude of the Aſſyrians) and perſwaded them to forſake their impieties, and the ſervices they had performed to ſtrange gods, and to honour the Soveraign and true God of their fathers, and to cleave unto him. He made a ſearch alſo thorow every houſe, borough and city, fearing leſt as yet there ſhould be an idoll hidden. He likewiſe ſought out the chariots that were made by his anceſtors, in honour of the Sunne, and all that which was adored whatſoever it were, and utterly aboliſhed the ſame. After he had in this ſort purged the countrey, he aſſembled all the people in Jeruſalem, where he celebrated the feaſt of unleavenned bread, and the ſolemnity of Eaſter. Towards the performance whereof, he gave the people young kids and lambes, to the number of thirty thouſand, and three thouſand bullocks for burnt-offerings and the chief among the Levites diſtributed amongſt the other Levites five hundreth lambes, and five hundreth bullocks. The Egyptians work their paſſage thorow Judea.

NECHAO King of Egypt having gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the flood Euphrates, to war againſt the Medes and Babylonians, who had deſtroyed the Empire of Aſſyria: for Nechao affected the government of all Aſia. Now when he drew near unto the city of Mende (which was under Joſias ſubjection) King Joſias denied him paſſage, and would not ſuffer his army to march thorow his countrey. For which cauſe Nechao ſent an Herald unto him, to let him underſtand, that it was not againſt him that he made war, but that he beat his courſe towards Euphrates: for which cauſe he wiſhed him in no ſort to hinder his intended journey, leſt thereby he ſhould be conſtrained to make war upon him. But Joſias reſpected not this demand of his, but reſolved himſelf to hinder his paſſage thorow his countrey: And truly I ſuppoſe that the deſtinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might have ſome occaſion to do ſome thing againſt Nechao. For whileſt he diſpoſed his army, and rode from one band to another, being mounted upon his chariot, he was ſtrucken with an arrow that was ſhot by a certain Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the ſpleen he had in war. For feeling himſelf ſorely oppreſſed with pain, by reaſon of his wound, he commanded his army to retire, and returned himſelf to Jeruſalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after he had lived nine and thirty years, and reigned thirty and one. For him the people mourned with great heavineſs, lamenting and ſorrowing for many dayes. The Prophet Jeremy alſo made a deploration over him in lamentable verſe, which is as yet extant even in theſe dayes. This Prophet left in writing thoſe evils which ſhould afterwards happen unto the citie, and the captivitie wherewith we are intangled at this preſent, and the ſurpriſal of Babylon. Neither hath he alone fore-told the ſame, but the Prophet Ezekiel hath likewiſe done the like; who firſt left two books written of the ſame argument. Theſe two Prophets were of the race of the Prieſts. But Jeremy kept in Jeruſalem, from the fourteenth year of the reign of Joſias, until the deſtruction of the Citie and Temple; as in time and place convenient we will declare, ſetting down thoſe occurrences that happened to this Prophet. After the death of Joſias (hitherto mentioned) his ſonne Joz ſucceeded him in the kingdom, at ſuch time as he was twenty and three years old, who reigned in Jeruſalem: his mothers name was Ametala: he was a man full of impiety, and of a malignant and perverſe nature. The King of Egypt returning from the warre, ſent unto Joaz, commanding him to meet with him in Samath a citie of Syria, where he was no ſooner arrived, but he kept him priſoner, committing the kingdom to Eliachim his brother (on the fathers ſide) who was his elder brother likewiſe. He changed his name likewiſe, and called him Joachim: he impoſed a tribute alſo on Judea, of one hundred talents of ſilver, and a talent of gold, which Joachim paid, and as touching Joaz, he led him into Egypt, where he finiſhed his dayes, after he had been King three moneths, and ten dayes. Now Joachims mother was called Zabuda, of the city of Abuma. He was a wicked perſon, and of a malignant nature, having neither piety towards God, nor reſpect of equitie towards men. H I K L

2 Kings 25. per tot. 2 Chron. 36.6 7. ad 21. Nebuchodonoſor king of Babylon warreth againſt the Egyptians.

IN the fourth year of his reign, a certain man called Nabuchodonoſor, poſſeſſed the kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great army againſt Carchabeſa (a city ſcituate near unto Euphrates) reſolving with himſelf to fight againſt Nechao King of Egypt, under whoſe power all Syria was ſubject. Nechao underſtanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge armie addreſſed himſelf towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulſe Nabuchodonoſor. But he was overcome in battel, and loſt divers tho uſands

A thousands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (passing Euphrates) seized all Syria as far as Pelusium (Judea onely excepted.) The fouth year that Nabuchodonosor reigned over these conquered countries, and in the eighth year of the reign of Joachim over the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his army against the Jews with a mighty power, threatning them to use all hostility, except Joachim would pay him tribute. Joachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with silver, and payed for three years space the tributes that were imposed on him. But in the third year (understanding that the Egyptian was up in arms against the Babylonian) he denyed the payment of the tribute, notwithstanding he was frustrated of his hope, for the Ægyptians were not so hardy as to make war. All which the Prophet Jeremy daily foretold him, signifying unto him that he builded his hope in vain upon the Ægyptians, and that it would fall out that the City should be overthrown by the King of Babylon, and

B Joachim himself should be delivered prisoner into his hands. But because there was no means for them to escape this justice, all that which he said was nothing availeable. For notwithstanding the people and Governours heard thereof, yet made they no reckoning of the same, but were displeased with those counsels which he proposed unto them, accusing Jeremy as if he took pleasure to utter and publish ominous and adverse presages against the king; they likewise called him in question before the Kings Counsel, and required that he might be condemned. Whereupon some of them gave sentence against him: they reproving the advice of the Elders that were thus addicted, took a more discreet course, and caused the Prophet to depart out of the Kings house, forbidding his adversaries to do him any mischief: they protesting that he had not onely foretold the future calamities of the City, but that

C many before him had done the like, as Micheas and divers others; and yet that no one of them had suffered any evil by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwise Micheas had been honoured as a Prophet sent from God. By these words they appeased the people, and delivered Jeremy from the death intended against him. This man wrote all his Prophecies, and read them to the people in their fasts, and assembled them in the Temple in the ninth month of the fifth year of the reign of Joachim, which book he had composed touching that which should happen unto the City, the Temple, and the people. When the Governors heard the same, they took the book from him, and commanded that both he and his Secretarie Baruch should withdraw themselves out of the sight of men: and they took the book,

D and presented it unto the King; who in the presence of his friends, commanded his Secretary to read the same: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and renting it in peeces, cast it into the fire, intending that it should never be seen. He sent out likewise a strict commission to seek out Jeremy and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be punished. But they had prevented his indignation.

But when the Babylonians were entred into the City, the King observed not his promises, but put all such to death as were in the flower and beauty of their years, and spared none of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with them also he slew their King Joachim, and caused his body to be cast from the top of the walls, and vouchsafed him no sepulture, establishing Joachin his son King of the country and of the City. Moreover he took three thousand of the most honourable Citizens of Jerusalem prisoners and led them to Babylon with him, amongst whom was the Prophet Ezechiel, at that time very young in years. AS soon as the Babylonian had bestowed the kingdome of Judea on Joachin, he was seized with a sudden fear, which made him suspect lest Joachin remembring himself of the injuries he had done unto him by the murther of his father, might draw the countrie into rebellion, and revolt against him. For which cause he sent out certain forces, and besieged Joachin in Jerusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an upright heart, was loth to forsake the Citie in that danger without a Governour, considering that it was for his cause that the Common-weal was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his H wife, and his neareſt a-kin with him, he delivered them into the hands of the Captains that were sent against him, receiving an oath from them, that neither they nor the Citie should receive any harm. But this promise continued not a year: for the king of Babylon observed it not, but commanded his Captains to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the Citie, and to bring them bound unto him. The number of them was ten thousand eight hundred thirty and two persons, besides Joachin, his mother, and his near allies, whom they took prisoners.

Sedechias is made King over Jerusalem, by the Babylonians.

I

2 Kings 24.17. Sedechias king of Jerusalem leduc d by his Courtiers and false prophets, giveth no ear to Jeremy.

IN stead of Joachin, he appointed Sedechias his Uncle King of Jerusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should govern the countrey without any innovation, or partial favour towards the Egyptians. This Sedechias was one and twenty years old, at such time as he came unto the kingdome, and was Joachims brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all laws, and a perverter of ordinances. For the young men that were about him were without the fear of God, and all the people under his dominions, committed whatsoever outrages were best liking unto them. For this cause the Prophet Jeremy came unto him, protesting oftentimes against him. and denouncing, that if he renounced not all those impieties and iniquities he used, and addicted not himself to that K which was just (but gave ear unto his Governours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false Prophets that mis-led him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make war against his City, but that the Egyptians should levie an army and overcome them) that then he should incur much misery: for (said he) they have no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gave ear to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people; but anon after his friends corrupted him, and diverted him according to their own opinions. Ezechiel also at the same time, had Prophesied in Babylon all those calamities which were to fall upon the Temple, and sent notice to Jerusalem of that which he had had received from God. Notwithstanding, Sedechias gave no credit to his Propheſies, by reason that all the Pro- L phets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the surprisal of the City, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezekiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Jeremy had Propheſied, that the King of Babylon should lead him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these two accorded not in their sayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things happened unto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as we will declare in a convenient place. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the king of Babylon for the space of eight years, he brake the league that was between them, and confederated with the Egyptians (under hope that they should overcome the Babylonians.) Which when the king of Babylon understood, he M led forth his army against him, and destroyed his countrey to the uttermost; so that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he finally planted his army and besieged Jerusalem. The Egyptian perceiving the state wherein his allie Sedechias was, levied an huge army, and came into Judea with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his army from Jerusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and overcame him in battel, and pursued him with such alacrity, that he put him to flight, and drave him altogether out of Syria. As soon as the Babylonian was dislodged from Jerusalem, the false prophe-

v. 20. Sedechias revolts from the Babylonian. Hedio & Rufinus chap. 10. 2 Kings 25.4. and 12.

The king of Egypt coming to rescue the king of Jerusalem, is overthrown by Nabuchodonosor with all his army, and driven out of Syria.

A phets deceived Sedechias, telling him that the Babylonian ſhould never more return, to make warre either againſt him, or his Nation, and that he ſhould never any more depart from his houſe in Babylon; and that they who had been led away captives, ſhould return home again, loaden with thoſe veſſels of the Temple which the King of Babylon had taken from them.

The yeer of the world, 3346. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 618.

But the Prophet Jeremie preſenting himſelf before the King, prophecied the contrary to theſe Impoſtors, aſſuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by means of the Egyptians, for that the Babylonians ſhould overcome them, and ſhould return and encamp before Jeruſalem, and beſiege the ſame, and deſtroy the people by famine, and lead them away priſoners that were remaining, and carry away all their ſubſtance; and that after they were ſeized of the riches of their Temple, they ſhould finally burn the ſame.

Divers men gave credit to theſe words of Jeremie; but the Governours and contemners of God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had been a man tranſported out of his ſence. And whereas he had an intent to viſit his native Countrey Anathoth, ſome twentie ſtounds off Jeruſalem, one of the Magiſtrates encountring him in his journey, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this ſlander, that he went and ſtole away to ſubmit

C himſelf to the Babilonians. But Jeremie anſwered, that he was falſely accuſed, and that he repaired onely to the place where he was born. This Prince giving him no credit, arreſted him, and brought him before the judgement ſeat, where he ſuſtained all ſorts of outrages and torments, and was ſhut up in priſon to be puniſhed, and remained there for a time, ſuffering the extremitie of wrong and injurie. The ninth yeer of the reign of Sedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth moneth, the King of Babylon came and encamped the ſecond time before Jeruſalem, and intrenched himſelf round about the ſame, for the ſpace of eighteen moneths, and laid battery and ſiege thereto, with as great ſpleen as might be poſſible: And they that were beſieged therein, were encountred with two moſt hainous afflictions, famine, and moſt grievous peſtilence. For which cauſe the King hearing this news, was ſorry that he had delivered the Prophet to the Governours, and commanded the Ethiopian to take thirtie men of his Court with him (with cords and ſuch other things neceſſary, as might concern the ſafetie of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliver him from that captivitie. Hereupon the Ethiopian furniſhed with men and neceſſarie means, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and diſmiſſed him without any guard. answer was, that although he should tell him, yet it would not be believed, and that if he G
The year of the world, 3354. before Christs Nativitie, 610. should exhort him, he would not give ear or listen unto him. But (said he) O King, thy friends have condemned me to death, as if I had been a most wicked malefactor. But where are they now at this present that have deceived thee, and born thee in hand, saying, that the Babylonian would not come and besiege thee? Now will I take heed how I tell thee the truth, for fear lest thou condemn me to death.

Hereupon the King swore unto him that he should not die, neither that he would deliver him into the hands of the Governours: for which cause Jeremie grounding himself upon the faith which he had plighted unto him, counselled the King to yield up the Citie to the Babylonian, because that God had willed him to signifie unto the King, that if he would save his life, and avoid the eminent danger, and save his Citie from utter ruine, and preserve the Temple from burning, he H should submit; or otherwise, that none but he should be the cause of all those evils that should happen unto the Citie and Citizens, and of that calamitie that should confound both him and all his family. When the King heard this, he told him that he would do according as he had counselled him, and perform whatsoever he thought necessary to be done: but that he feared his friends, who were already of the Babylonian faction, lest being accused by them, he should be delivered (by their means, and the Kings displeasure) unto death. But the Prophet encouraged him, telling him that his fear was in vain; assuring him that he should suffer no evil, if so be he yielded up the Citie: and that neither his wife, nor children, nor the sacred Temple should endure either disaster, death, or overthrow.

Upon these words the King dismissed Jeremy, chargeing him to communicate the coun- I sell that was held between them to no one of the Citizens, no not to the Princes, if so be they should light of any inkling of their conference, or ask of him wherefore the King had sent for him: advising him to answer, if so be they were inquisitive, that he resorted to the King, to request him that he might be no more imprisoned: all which the Prophet performed; but they instanced him very much to know, for what cause the King had sent for him.

Jerusalem is taken, and the people carried into Babylon by Nabuchodonosor. K

2 King. 25. 1, &c. Jerusalem besieged 18. moneths, and at length taken.

MEan while, the Babylonian continued his violent siege against the Citie of Jerusalem, and having raised Towers upon certain Bulwrakes, he drave away by this means all those that approached neer unto the wals: he raised also (round about the circuit of the Citie) divers plat-forms, that equalled the walls in height. Mean-while, the Citie was as valiantly and couragiously defended by the inhabitants; for neither pestilence, nor famine plucked down their spirits: And although that within the Citie they were tormented with these scourges, yet were not their resolutions distracted by the warre, neither did the enemies inventions astonish them, nor their Engines affright them; but that they invented new Countermines: so that all the battell betwixt the Babylonians and Jews L seemed to be a trial both of valour and Art: whilest these by the one doe assuredly hope to surprize the Citie, and the other thought their safetie consisteth herein, if they ceased not by new inventions to frustrate their enemies endeavours: And in this estate continued they both, for the space of eighteen moneths, untill they were consumed by famine, and by the darts that were shot against them by those that shot from the Towers. At length, the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon (in the eleventh yeer of the reign of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth moneth) who were put in trust by Nabuchodonosor to perform the siege. For touching his own person he made his abode in the Citie of Reblata. Now if any man be desirous to know the names of them that had commandment at such time as Jerusalem was surprized, these they be, Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Nabosar, and Echarampsor. The Citie being taken about midnight, the Princes of the enemies Army entred M into the Temple; which when Zedechias understood, he took his wives and his children, with the Princes and his friends, and fled thorow a great valley by the desart: which when the Babylonians understood by certain Jews that were revolted, and had submitted themselves unto them, they arose early in the morning to pursue them, and overtooke and surprized them neer unto Jericho. Whereupon those Princes and friends of Sedechias that had taken their flight with him, seeing the enemies neer unto them, forsook him, and scattering themselves here and there, concluded each of them to save himself. When as therefore the enemies had apprehended him, who was attended by a few followers onely, and accompanied by his children and wives, they brought him unto the Kings presence; who

Furthermore he reproached him for his ingratitude, in that having received the royaltie from his hands (which he had taken from Joachin to beſtow on him) he had notwithſtanding employed all his forces againſt his benefactour. But (ſaid he) that great God that hateth thy treachery, hath delivered thee into my hands: and when he had ſpoken theſe words, he cauſed Sedechias friends and children to be ſlain before his eyes, with all his other priſoners: afterwards commanding his eyes to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. All which happened unto him, according as the Prophets, Jeremy and Ezekiel had fore-told him: namely, that he ſhould be ſurprized and brought before the king of Babylon, and ſhould ſpeak with him face to face, and ſhould ſee him with his eyes (for ſo had Jeremy propheciedd) but being made blinde and conducted to Babylon, he ſhould not ſee the City of Ba-
B bylon (according as Ezekiel had fore-told.) All which may ſufficiently expreſſe to thoſe that know not the nature of God, how divers and admirable his judgements be, in diſpoſing all things in good order, and preſignifying thoſe things that are to come, even as in this place there appeareth a moſt ſignal example of humane errour and incredulitie, by which it was not lawful for them to avoid their future calamity, neither ſhunne their unremovable deſtiny. Thus was the race of the Kings extinguiſhed that deſcended from David, who were in number one and twenty, that reigned after him. All of them together governed five hundred and fourteen years ſix moneths, and ten dayes: adding thereunto the twenty years of the firſt king Saul, who was of another Tribe. After this, the Babylonian ſent Nabu-
C zardan General of his army unto Jeruſalem to ſpoil the Temple, giving him in charge to burn both it and the kings palace, and to raze and level the City with the ground; and afterwards to tranſport the people into Babylon. Who arrived there the eleventh year of the reign of Sedekias, ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels that were conſecrated to Gods ſervice, both thoſe of gold, as alſo them of ſilver: he took likewiſe the great Laver that was given by Solomon; the columnes and pillars of braſſe, with their chapters likewiſe, and the tables and candleſticks of gold: and after he had born away all things, he burned then Temple the firſt day of the fifth moneth of the eleventh year of Sedechias reign which was the eighteenth of Nabuch donoſors government. He burned alſo the Kings royal Palace, and razed the City. This temple was burned 470. years, ſix moneths, and ten dayes after the foundation thereof: and in the year 1062. ſix moneths and ten dayes after the departure of D the people out of Egypt: and 1950. years, ſix moneths, and ten dayes, after the Deluge: from the creation of Adam untill the ruine of the Temple, there were three thouſand five hundred and thirteen years, ſix monethes, and ten dayes. Thus have we ſet down the number of the years, and orderly expreſſed what, and in what time every thing hath been performed. The General for the king of Babylon having deſtroyed the City, and tranſported the people, took priſoner the high Prieſt Sareas, and his fellow in the office, the Prieſt Sephan, with the governours and keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch alſo which had the charge over the reſt, and ſeven of Sedechias frends, and his Secretary, beſides ſixty other Governours, all which (together with the veſſels which he had pillaged) he ſent to Reblatha a City of Syria, unto the king of Babylon; who commanded in E that place that the high Prieſt and Governours ſhould be beheaded: as for the reſt of the priſoners, and Sedechias the kipg, he carried them with him to Babylon; he ſent alſo in bonds with the reſt, Joſadoch the ſonne of Sareas the high Prieſt, whom he had put to death in Reblatha (as we have heretofore declared.) And for that we have reckoned up the race of the kings, and ſet dowu likewiſe what they were, and how long they continued, me ſeemeth that it ſhall not be unneceſſary to recite the names of the high Prieſts, and to report who they have been, that have adminiſtred the Prieſthood under the Kings. Sadoc was the firſt high Prieſt of the Temple builded by Solomon. After him his ſonne Achimas ſucceeded in that honour, and after Achimas, Azarias, after whom ſucceeded Joram, and after Joram
F Joſchua, after Joſchua Axioram, who had for his ſucceſſour Phideas, to Phideas ſucceeded Sudeas, to Sudeas Julus, to Julus Jotham, to Jotham Urias, to Urias Nerias, ro Nerias Odeas, to Odeas Saldum, to Saldum Elcias, to Elcias Sareas, to Sareas Joſadoch, who was carried away priſoner into Babylon: all which have ſucceeded in the Prieſthood by lineal deſcent. When Nabuchodonoſor was come to Babylon, he ſhut up Sedechias in priſon, where he kept him untill he died, and after his death he honoured him with a royal Tombe. He likewiſe offered the veſſels that he had taken out of the Temple of Jeruſalem unto his gods, and cauſed the people to inhabite the countrey of Babylon, delivering the high Prieſt from his bonds. The General Nabuzardan that led the people away captive, left the poorer ſort in the countrey of Judea; and thoſe alſo that voluntarily yeelded themſelves unto him, over whom he appointed Godolias the ſon of Aicam Governour (a man that was both upright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their aſſigned tribute to the King. He drew the Prophet Jeremy alſo out of priſon, perſwading him to repair with him to the King of Babylon: telling him that he had received expreſſe commandment from the king, to furniſh him with all things neceſſary for that journey: but if he were not contented to repair to Babylon, he ſhould declare unto him in what place he would make his abode, to the intent he might certifie the king thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or ſojourn in any other place, deſiring rather to live amidſt the ruins of his countrey, and among the pitious reliques of his poor nation. H

C. 40. v. 4. Godolias captain of the fugitives. Jeremy ſet at liberty by the Babylonian, and richly offered and preſented.

When the General Nebuzardan underſtood his reſolution, he gave charge to the Governour Godolias (whom he left in Judea) to have care of him, and to furniſh him with all that which he wanted, and after he had gratified him with preſents, he departed. Mean while Jeremy dwelt in the City of Maſphath, praying Nebuzardan that he would ſend him his diſciple Baruch (the ſon of Neria, a man of a noble family, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as theſe that during the ſiege of Jeruſalem were retired out of the city, underſtood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they aſſembled together from all parts, and came to Maſphath to Godolias, under the conduct of John the ſon of Careas, and Jezanais and Sareas, and others. And beſides theſe, a certain man called Iſmael of the I blood royal, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the ſiege of the City, had retired himſelf to Bathal king of the Ammonites, and had ſojourned with him during all the troubles. Who being in this ſort aſſembled before him, Godolias counſelled to remain in that countrey without any fear of the Babylonians, promiſing that in manuring their land, they ſhould incurre no inconvenience. All which he confirmed unto them by an oath, adding further, that if any diſturbance were offered to any man, he would readily aſſiſt him. He gave each one this advice likewiſe, to inhabite any City that beſt liked them: promiſing them to ſend them thither, with ſuch things as appertained to them, to build them houſes and furniſh their habitation; promiſing them that when time ſerved, he would make their K proviſion of corn, wine, and oyl, for their maintenance during the winter time; which when he had propoſed theſe conditions unto them, he gave them leave to depart, and inhabite the countrey whereſoever they beſt liked. Now when the rumour ran amongſt the people of Judea, that Godolias had thus courteouſly entertained thoſe that were fugitives, and how he had permitted them to inhabite and till the countrey (provided that they payed their tribute to the Babylonian) divers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the countrey. And John and the other Governours being with him, and aſſured both of his clemency and courteſie, began intirely to love him. For which cauſe they told him, that Bathal king of the Ammonites had ſent Iſmael to murther him by ſome treachery, that by that meanes he might have the dominion over the Iſraelites that remained, in that he was of the blood royal. Aſſuring him, that the means of his deliverance from that treaſon, was, if ſo be he L would command them to kill Iſmael in ſecret: aſſuring him on the contrary ſide, that they feared, that if Iſmael ſhould happen to kill him, their whole Nation that remained, was like to fall to utter ruine. But Godolias told him plainly, that theſe ſtratagems they intended, » were practiſed againſt a man that had received pleaſure at his hands: and that it was not » likely that he whom he had ſuccoured during the time of his neceſſity, would be ſo wicked » or impious againſt his benefactor, as to attempt to murther him, whom in any occaſion or » neceſſity he could not, but to his great ſhame and indignity, either fly or forſake. Yea, ſaid » he, although thoſe things were true which you informe me of, yet had I rather die, then » oppreſſe a man that hath committed his life to my truſt. For which cauſe John and the reſt » (ſeeing their perſwaſions were in vain) departed from him. Some thirty dayes after, Iſmael M (accompanied with ten men) came to Maſphath to Godolias, who received them with preſents and magnificent entertainment, ſo that to expreſſe to Iſmael and his companions how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk ſo hard that he was ſomewhat overſeen with wine. Now when Iſmael perceived him to be in that ſort, and overloaden with drink and ſleep, he ſtept unto him with his ten aſſociates, and cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him company at the banquet; after which murther, he iſſued out by night and ſlew all the Jewes that were left in the City, and thoſe Babylonian ſouldiers alſo that were left in garriſon in that place. The next day there came foureſcore men of the countrey to Godolias with preſents, being utterly ignorant of that which had happened. Iſmael knowing them, called them unto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as ſoon as they were entred, he locked the court, and ſlew them, and afterwards caſt their bodies into a deep ditch, to the intent

A intent they might not be diſcovered. Of this number there were ſome that eſcaped, who beſought him that they might not be put to death, before they had delivered certain moveables, garments and corn that they had hidden in the field: which when Iſmael underſtood, he ſpared them: but he kept them priſoners that were in Maſphath, with their wives and children, in the number of whom were the daughters of Sedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired back again to the King of the Ammonites. John and the governours of his company, underſtanding of the acts committed by Iſmael in Maſphath, and above all, of the murther of Godolias, they were wonderfully diſpleaſed: ſo that each of them aſſembling his private force, iſſued forth to purſue and perſecute Iſmael, whom they overtook neer unto a fountain in Hebron. The priſoners that were with Iſmael, ſeeing John his confederates, took courage, ſuppoſing that it was ſome ſuccours that came to B help them, & forſooke him that led them, and began to joyn with Johns followers: and thus fled Iſmael with his eight men, to the King of the Ammonites. John gathering together all thoſe whom he had reſcued from Iſmaels hands, both Eunuchs, women, and children, retired into a certain place called Mandra, where he ſojourned all that day, reſolving from thence to depart into Egypt, fearing leſt the Babylonians ſhould put him to death, if they ſhould remain in Judea, for that they would be diſpleaſed with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the government.

v. 12. ad finem. John releaſeth Iſmaels captives.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with theſe deliberations; they addreſſed themſelves to the Prophet Jeremy, beſeeching him to enquire of God, and to certifie them, what it behoved
C them to do in this their doubtful eſtate, binding themſelves by an oath to do that which Ieremy ſhould command them." Hereupon the Prophet promiſed that he would ask counſel of "God for them: and ſome ten dayes after, God appeared unto him, and willed him to certifie "John, the governours, and the reſt of the people, that if they inhabited Judea, he would aſ- "ſiſt them, and have care of them, and keep them ſo, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) ſhould do them no harm: but if they departed into Egypt, he would abandon them, and "would be ſo incenſed againſt them, that he ſhould thrall them in the like miſery, as their bre- "thren had indured in times paſt. Whileſt the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not believe him, in that he commanded them to remain in that place by Gods pre-
D ſcript ordinance: but they imagined that under a falſe pretext of Gods command, he had counſelled them thereto, but that in effect he ſpake in favour of his diſciple Baruch, perſwading them to ſtay there, to the end they might be conſumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counſel which God gave them by the Prophet: both John and the reſt of the multitude went into Egypt, and led with them both Baruch and Ieremy. Whither they were no ſooner come, but God told the Prophet, that the Babylonian ſhould lead his army into Egypt; for which cauſe he willed him to fore-tell the people that Egypt ſhould be deſtroyed, and that they ſhould partly be ſlain in that place, and partly led captive to Babylon. Which came in like manner to paſſe: for in the fifth year after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem
E (which was the three and twentieth year of the reign of Nabuchodonoſor) Nabuchodonoſor in in his own perſon led his army into Cœloſyria, and having conquered the ſame, he made war upon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought theſe Nations under his obeyſance, he went and fought againſt the King of Egypt, and overcame him: and after he had ſlain their King that governed at that time, and planted another in his place, he afterwards toook the Jews that he found in that countrey, and carried them priſoners into Babylon. By this means we have learned that the eſtate of the Hebrews being brought to this point, hath been tranſlated twice to the other ſide of Euphrates. For the people of the two Tribes, were captived by the Aſſyrians, during the reigne of Oſeas; and conſequently that of the two
F Tribes under Nabuchodonoſor King of the Babylonians and Chaldees upon the taking in of Jeruſalem. True it is that Salmanazar, after he had diſplaced the Iſraelites, planted the Chutheans in their place, who beforetime inhabited the innermoſt of the countries of Perſia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian having led the two Tribes priſoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

For this cauſe, Judea, Jeruſalem, and the Temple, remained deſart for the ſpace of ſeventy yeers: and all the time that paſſed between the captivitie of the Iſraelites, untill the deſtruction of the two Tribes, was a hundred and thirty yeers, ſix moneths, and ten dayes. But Nabuchodonoſor choſe the moſt nobleſt young men amongſt the Jews (and ſuch as were allied to King Sedechias, and eſteemed likewiſe for the good diſpoſition and faire proportion of their bodies and faces) and committed them to maſters to be inſtructed, commanding that every one of them ſhould be gelded, according as they were accuſtomed to deal with young children of other Nations, whom he ſubdued by force. He allowed them victual G from his own table, and they were taught and inſtructed in the diſcipline of the countrey, and in the Chaldee tongue. Theſe were very apt to learn wiſdom: and for that cauſe he commanded that they ſhould be trained up in the exerciſe thereof. Of theſe were four of Zedekias kindred, fair in body, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias; whoſe names the Babylonian changed, and willed them to be called by other names, diſtinct and different from their own: Daniel was called Belthaſar; Ananias, Sidrach; Miſael, Miſach; and Azarias, Abednago. Theſe did the King eſteem very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attain unto learning and wiſdom, wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cauſe highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinſmen thought good to live auſteerly, and to abſtain H from thoſe meats that came from the Kings table, and in general from all things that had life, they went to Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beſeeching him to convert thoſe meats to his own uſe, which were ſent from the Kings table, and allow them herbs and dates, and ſuch things as had no life; becauſe they intended to hold that courſe of life and to forſake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condiſcend unto their demands; but that he feared, leſt being called for by the King, they ſhould be found to be lean in body, and diſcoloured in face (for without doubt following that diet, they muſt needly loſe their colours, and be leſs diſpoſed in compariſon of others) which might be the cauſe to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiving that Askenas intended nought elſe but his ſecuritie, perſwaded him to allow them but ten dayes of appro- I bation, under condition, that if by that regiment of diet, their habitude of body ſhould not be any wayes altred, they might continue in that faſhion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they ſhould be found lean and weak, and leſs proportionable then they that fed upon the Kings allowance, that then they ſhould return to their accuſtomed diet. Now it ſo fell out, that not only their bodies were better in growth, but they ſeemed rather better fed, and of a taller ſtature then the reſt: ſo that they that lived upon the Kings ordinarie, ſeem'd lean and weariſh; whereas Daniel and his companions made ſhew, as if they had been nouriſhed with dainties, and brought up in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the four young men from the Kings table, and boldly kept it to himſelf, giving them in ſtead thereof, the diet that they choſe and delighted in. They having their ſpirits more pure and ſubtil to comprehend K their maſters inſtructions, and their bodies more ſtrong to endure labour (for their ſpirits were not charged with diverſity of meats, nor their bodies effeminated for the ſame cauſe) attained the more readily to all that doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrews and Chaldees: Daniel eſpecially having profited in wiſdome, ſtudied the interpretation of dreams, and God appeared unto him. Two years after the ſurpriſal of Egypt, King Nabu- chodonoſor dreamed a wonderful dream, the iſſue whereof God made him ſee in a dream:

but he forgat the ſame when he aroſe out of his bed. And for that cauſe ſent he for his Chaldees and divines, telling them that he had dreamed a dream, but that he had forgot the ſame, commanding them to declare unto him what the dream was, and the ſignification L thereof alſo. Wherunto they anſwered, that it was impoſſible for men to ſound out the ſecret thereof; notwithſtanding they promiſed him, that if he would declare his viſion unto them, they would cauſe him to underſtand the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchadonoſor threatned them with death, except they repreſented his dream unto him; and they proteſting that they could not fulfill his requeſt, he commanded them all to be ſlain. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions had part in that danger, addreſſed himſelf to Ariochus the Captain of the Kings guard, requiring him to inform him, for what cauſe the King had adjudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: And having intelligence what had happened as touching M the dream, & how the King by forgetting the ſame, had charged them to inform him therin, and how they had anſwered that it was impoſſible for them to perform the ſame, and how thereby they had provoked the King to diſpleaſure: he beſought Ariochus to go unto the King, and to procure one nights reprieve in the behalf of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night time to beſeech God, and intreat from him both the dream and the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King that Daniel had requeſted, who reſpited the execution of the Magicians for that night, untill he might ſee what would become of Daniels promiſe: who retyring himſelf with his companions into his chamber, beſought God all the night long to manifeſt unto him the dream, and deliver the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom both he and the reſt of his companions

companions were like to die, except he might know what the King had dreamt the night past, and what was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (having compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniels wisdome) signified unto him both the dream and the signification thereof, to the intent the King might be resolved in the meaning thereof. The year of the world, 3363. before Christs Nativitie, 601.

Daniel having received the truth from God, arose very joyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gave them courage and hope of life. Having therefore rendred thanks unto God, for that he had had compassion of their younger years, as soon as it was day he went unto Arioch requesting him that he might be brought to the kings presence, certifying him that he would open "unto him the dream which he had seen the night past. Now when Daniel was brought unto "the kings presence, he besought him that he would not esteem him to be more wise then "the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his "dream, he did attempt to express the same: for that came not to pass, by reason of his expe- "rience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had com- "passion on us that were in danger of death; & at such time as I requested him to grant me, "and my countrey-men life, he hath certified me both of your dream, and the signification "thereof. I was not so much agrieved, for that in our innocency we were adjudged to death "by thee, as affraid of thine estimation & glory, which was hazarded by condemning so ma- "ny, and so innocent and just men to death: wheras that which you have required of them, "savoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the only work of God: Whilest therefore thou "thoughtest in thy self, who it was that should command the whole world after thy self, at "such time as thou wert asleep, God intending to let thee know all those that should govern "after thee, presented thee with this dream. It seemed unto thee that thou sawest a great sta- "tue, whereof the head was of gold; the shoulders and arms of silver; the belly and thighs "of brass; and the legs and feet of iron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was "drawn from a mountain) that fell upon the statue, and beat down and burst the same, and "left no whole piece thereof; so that the gold, silver, iron & brass, were powdered as small as "dust: whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was "born away and scattered into divers countries: on the other side the stone grew so mighty, "that it seemed to fil that whole earth. This was that vision that appeared unto you, the signi- "fication whereof is expressed after this manner: The head of gold signifieth your self (and "those Kings of Babylon that have been before you.) The two hands and shoulders signifie "that your Empire shall be restored by two kings, the one part by the king of the East, cloa- "thed in brass, whose force shall be abated by another power resembling that of iron, and he "shall have the power over the whole earth, by reason of the nature of iron, which is more "strong then gold, silver, or brass; he told the King also what the stone signified.* But for mine own part, I thought it not expedient to express in this place: because the onely Butt and intent of my writings is only to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man have a desire to know these things; and cannot bridle his curiositie, but will understand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shall finde amidst the sacred Scriptures. When King Nabuchodonosor had heard those things, and remembred himself of his dream, he was astonished at Daniels wisdome, and casting himself prostrate on the earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giving direction that sacrifice should be offered unto him, as if he were God. Moreover, he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdome to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their malignours & detractours, happened to fall into most imminent and dreadful danger, upon the occasion that ensueth. The King built a golden Image sixtie cubits high, and six in bigness, and erected it in a great Plain neer unto Babylon: and being ready to dedicate the same, he assembled all the Governours and Princes of his countries, commanding them first of all, that as soon as they should hear the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselves on the earth to adore the statue; threatning that whosoever should do the contrary, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue upon the sound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his companions utterly refused to perform that duty, alledging for their justification, that they would not transgress the laws of their countrey: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods providence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burn during their aboad in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies, that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made

" ing at that time in himſelf unable to endure the troubles of war) committed a part of his " forces unto his ſon Nabuchodonoſor, who was in the flower of his age, and ſent him forth a-" gainſt him: who encountring the Rebel, and fighting with him, overcame him, and " brought the countrey under his ſubjection. Mean-while, Nabuchodonoſor the father died of " a ſickneſs in Babylon, after he had reigned one and twentie years. Nabuchodonoſor the ſon, " having notice of his fathers death, gave order to the affairs of Egypt, and the reſt of the " countrey: and committing the care and tranſportation of the Jews, Syrians, Egyptians,
" and Phœnicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his armie and carriage,
" he with a few men made haſtie journies thorow the deſart. And when he had taken the " adminiſtration of the kingdom upon him (which in his abſence was in the hands of the

" repaired and beautified it with other buildings: by means whereof, they that would beſiege
" the ſame, were hindred from cutting off the current of the river, to the prejudice of the in" habitants. He environed it inwardly with a treble wall, and outwardly with as mightie
" and as many encloſures, and made all of burnt brick. The walls were magnificently buil" ded, & the gates bravely adorned in manner of Temples. He cauſed a Palace to be builded
" near unto his fathers ancient Palace: the magnificence and ornament whereof, I am too L
" weak witted to expreſs; only this thing moſt memorable, I have thought good to note

The year of the world, 3382. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 582.

AFter Nabuchodonoſors death, his ſonne Evilmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incontinently delivered Jechonias King of Jeruſalem out of priſon, and held him in the number of his moſt eſteemed friends, and gave him preſents, and committed the government of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his father had not kept his promiſe with Jechonias, when he ſurrendred himſelf, his wife, children, and B friends into his hands, in the behalf of his countrey, and to the intent that the City of Jeruſalem ſhould not be razed by thoſe that beſieged it, as we have heretofore declared. Evilmerodach died in the eighteenth year of his reign, and Nigliſar his ſon obtained the kingdome, which he poſſeſſed fourty years, and afterward died. After him the ſucceſſion of the kingdome came unto his ſon called Laboſardach, which continued in him but for the ſpace of nine moneths, and after his death it came unto Balthaſar, who by the Babylonian was called Naboandel. Againſt him Cyrus king of Perſia, and Darius king of Media made war; at ſuch time as he was beſieged in Babylon, there hapned a marvellous and prodigious ſpectacle.

Evilmerodach releaſeth Jechonias from his long impriſonment. 4 King. 25. 27. Jer. 52. 31. ad finem. Nigliſar. Laboſardach Balthaſar, of Naboandel King of Babylon.

C Balthaſar ſate upon a certain feſtival in a royal chamber, where he was ſerved with great ſtore of veſſel fit for his Majeſtie and royaltie; and with him at the banquet there ſate his concubines, and moſt intireſt friends. At which time (to ſhew his magnificence) he cauſed thoſe veſſels to be brought out of the Temple of his god, which Nabuchodonoſor his predeceſſor (fearing to employ to his own uſe) had ſtored up in his Idols temple. But Balthaſar was ſo puffed with pride, that he drank out of them, and employed them to his uſes. Now ſo came it to paſſe, that whileſt he quaffed, and blaſphemed the Name of God, he ſaw a hand iſſuing from a wall, which wrote in the ſame certain ſyllables: by which viſion being ſomewhat terrified, he aſſembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and all that ſorts of people (who amongſt thoſe barbarous nations made profeſſion to interpret prodigies and dreams) to the intent they might ſignifie unto him the meaning and underſtanding of that writing. Now D when theſe Magicians had told him that they could in no ſort ſound or underſtand the ſame, the king was ſore vexed and troubled at this unexpected viſion: whereupon he cauſed it to be proclaimed thorow his countrey, that whoſoever ſhould read that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would give him a golden chain, a purple robe (ſuch as the king of Chaldees wore) and beſides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magicians aſſembled together with greater concourſe, and were farre more diligent and inquiſitive to find out the ſignification of the writing: but they were no leſſe grounded therein then they were at the firſt. Mean while, the kings grandmother ſeeing him wholly amated in mind, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certain man amongſt the priſoners of Juda, led thither at ſuch time as Nabuchodonoſor deſtroyed Jeruſalem, whoſe name was Daniel, a man wiſe and expert in ſearching out of things that were impoſ- E ſible, and onely known unto God, who evidently expounded that which Nabuchodonoſor required at ſuch time, as no other man could ſatisfie his demand. Whereupon the king called him unto his preſence, and telling him what proofs he had heard of his wiſdome, and of that divine ſpirit that was in him, and how he onely was fit to interpret thoſe things which otherwiſe were obſcured from other mens knowledge; he prayed him to informe him what that hand-writing ſignified, promiſing him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chain, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with theſe titles for his wiſdome, he might grow famous amongſt all men, who demanding the reaſon, ſhould F know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refuſing all theſe preſents of his, "in that the wiſdome that is given from above, is not corrupted thereby, but is freely an- "ſwerable to thoſe that have need thereof) told him that that writing did foretell him the end "of his life, becauſe he had not learned to fear God, neither to lift up his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithſtanding he had ſeen the chaſtiſement wherewith his predeceſſour had been puniſhed, for the outrages he committed againſt God. For that Nabuchodonoſor having been driven to lead his life amongſt beaſts by reaſon of his impieties, after divers requeſts and ſupplications, had obtained mercy, and was returned unto humane converſation, and into his own kingdome, for which cauſe all the time of his life he praiſed Almighty God the governour of all things: whereas he had omitted to do the like, and had blaſphemed the Name of God in divers ſorts, and had ſwilled both himſelf and his concubines in the veſſels dedicated to God: For this cauſe God was diſpleaſed with him, and certified him by this writing, what end he ſhould expect. Whereupon he expounded the writings in theſe termes: Mane (which is as much to ſay, as number) ſheweth that God hath numbred the dayes of thy life and dominion, which ſhall endure but a little while; Thekel ſignifieth a balance; God therefore (ſaid he) waying the government, ſheweth that it ſhall be overthrown: Phares, this word ſignifieth a fragment, God ſhall break thy kingdome, & divide it among the Meads, and Perſians. When the king had heard this interpretation, he was very ſorrowful (according as the nature of things ſo dyſaſterous, and ſo apparant required.) Notwithſtanding he delaied not to performe thoſe preſents which he had promiſed the Prophet, although (as he well perceived) the words aboaded him ill, and gave him all that which he promiſed him, conſidering with himſelf, that it was his own deſtiny that he ought to accuſe, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithſtanding they were very unſavoury to his ear. Not long after, this Balthaſar and the City were overthrown and taken by Cyrus King of Perſia and his army; For this was that Balthaſar, under whom, and in the ſeventeenth year of whoſe reign, the ſurpriſal of Babylon hapned. This as far as I could gather, was the end of king Nebuchodonoſors poſterity.

Darius, who (with his allie Cyrus) had deſtroyed the ſtate of the Babylonians, was threeſcore and two years old at ſuch time as he took Babylon. He was Aſtyages ſonne, and is otherewaies called by the Greeks. He took the Prophet Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him near unto him, doing him much honour: for he was of the number of the three governours whom he conſtituted over three hundred and threeſcore Provinces; for ſo had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and onely truſted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grievouſly hated: for they are moſt hainouſly hated, who have greateſt intereſt in Princes favours. Whereas therefore they that were jealous of the good eſteeme which he had with Darius, ſought occaſion to calumniate and backbite him, he warily cut off all opportunity thereof; for he would neither be bribed with ſilver, nor corrupted with preſents ſuppoſing it to be an act of much diſhoneſty to receive gifts after a man had done any courteſies. He therefore gave his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. Yet notwithſtanding, they ſeeing they could find no hole in his coat, whereby his honour might be touched, blamed, or calumniated, they ſought out a new means to diſgrace him. For they perceiving that Daniel did thrice every day make his prayer unto God, they ſuppoſed that they had found a juſt pretext to work his ruine. For which cauſe they came unto Darius, certifying that the Princes and Governours had concluded together to this effect: that for 30 dayes ſpace an interminſſion ſhould be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawful for them to demand any thing, neither of himſelf, or of any man or God whatſoever; and if any man ſhould attempt any thing againſt this common decree, it was ordered that he ſhould be caſt into the Lions den. But the king perceiving not the drift of their malice, nor how they ſought by this device to entrap Daniel, told them that he liked of the decree, and promiſed to confirme the ſame, and propounded a publick edict, wherein the Princes reſolutions were ratified. Now whileſt all men endeavoured through fear, carefully and deligently to obſerve this edict, Daniel ſet light thereby, and according to his accuſtomed manner ſtanding in all mens ſight, he worſhipped his God, and prayed unto him. Whereupon the Princes (having got that occaſion which they long expected) came readily unto the king, and accuſed Daniel for that he onely amongſt the reſt had preſumed to infringe their decree: urging moreover, that he did it not for the religion ſake that was in him, but becauſe he was obſerved and watcht by his maligners. And for that they feared leſt Darius by reaſon of the great affection he bare unto Daniel, ſhould be ready to pardon him (notwithſtanding he had tranſgreſſed their edict) they concluded upon no milder judgement, but that he might be caſt into the Lions den, according to the forme of the edict. Darius hoping that God would deliver Daniel; and that no harme ſhould befall him by the jawes of wilde beaſts, exhorted him patiently to endure that adventure. Now as ſoon as he was caſt into the den, the king ſealed up the ſtone that cloſed the mouth thereof and departed, ſpending all that night without repaſt or repoſe, ſo grievouſly was he diſtempered in Daniels behalf. And when the day was come, as ſoon as he aroſe, he came unto the denne, and finding the ſeal unbroken wherewith he had marked the ſtone, he opened the ſame, and called unto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were whole and in ſafety? He hearing the king ſpeak, anſwered, that he had received no hurt. Whereupon Darius commanded that they ſhould draw him out of the Lions den. His adverſaries perceiving that Daniel had eſcaped all inconveniences (becauſe

For which cauſe the King diſpleaſed with their injurious malice, commanded a quantity of fleſh to be caſt unto the Lions; and when they were glutted, he willed that Daniels enemies ſhould be caſt among them, to the intent he might know whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius ſaw very manifeſtly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as ſoon as the Nobles were caſt into the den, the Lions ſpared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as if they had been hungry and without meat. I ſuppoſe that theſe Lions having been a little " before glutted with meat, did not annoy theſe men by reaſon of their famine; but I rather " judge that their malignity did whet on their fury: for when as God ſo pleaſeth, unreaſonable "
B creatures doe juſtice upon malignant and envious men. Daniels adverſaries being in this " ſort exterminated and deſtroyed, Darius gave notice hereof to all the ſubjects of his provinces praiſing that God whom Daniel adored; ſaying, that he was the onely true God, who had all power: he honoured Daniel likewiſe with eſpeciall regard, eſteeming him amongſt the chiefeſt of his familiars. He therefore being thus famous and admirable (becauſe he was beloved by God) builded in Ecbatane in the countrey of the Medes a magnificent Caſtle, and a marvellous monument that remaineth even unto this day, which ſeemeth to thoſe that look thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that very day which they behold the ſame; the beauty thereof ſeemeth ſo living and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no ſort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they wax old and are in-
C feebled by yeers, and loſe their beauty; at this day all the Kings of Media, Perſia, and Parthia, are intombed in this Caſtle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Prieſt, who is a Jew: and this cuſtome continueth even untill this day. Neither is that to be buried in ſilence, which is worthy eſpeciall admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicitie that was incident to a moſt famous Prophet attended him; and during his whole life-time he was both moſt highly honoured by Kings, and reverenced by the common ſort: and after his death his memory is perdurable. For all the books which he left in writing, are read amongſt us even at this preſent; and we have been perſwaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not onely prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets have done) but alſo hath determined the time wherein thoſe things ſhould happen.
D And whereas other Prophets were accuſtomed to foretell adverſities, and for that occaſion were miſliked both by Princes and their people, Daniel foretold them alwaies good ſucceſſes ſo that he hath drawn unto him the good will of all men, by reaſon of thoſe pleaſing predictions that he pronounced; and by the iſſues thereof, he hath obtained a teſtimony of truth, and a reputation likewiſe of divinitie, and hath left us certain writings, by which he hath manifeſtly declared the immutabilitie and exact certaintie of his prophecies.

It is ſaid, that being at Suſa the Metropolitane Citie of Perſia, at ſuch time as he walked abroad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earth-quake with a great noiſe: ſo that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon being ſore troubled, he fell upon his face, and both his hands: at which time ſome one touched him, and
E commanded him to ſtand up, and to ſee that which ſhould happen to his countrey-men after divers ages. Beeing therefore raiſed upright, there was a great Ram ſhewed unto him, that had divers hornes, the laſt whereof was the greateſt of all. Afterwards he looked towards the Weſt, and perceived a Goat carried thorow the ayre, that butted at the Ram, and having encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him under his feet. Thirdly, he ſaw a Goat, in whoſe forehead there grew one great horne onely: which being broken, foure others brake out in ſtead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure windes of the world. He hath written alſo, that from them, there ſhall ariſe another little one alſo, which as God (who preſented the viſion to him) told him, being grown to perfection, ſhould war againſt the whole nation of the Jews, and take the Citie by force, and confound the eſtate
F of the Temple, and hinder the ſacrifices, for one thouſand two hundreth ninetie and ſixe dayes.

Dan. 7.3, ad 27. Daniels viſion of the Ram and Goat, by whom the Kings of Media and Perſia were preſigured.

Daniel writeth that he ſaw theſe things in the field of Suſa, and hath declared that God himſelfe told him what that viſion ſignified; which was, that the Ram ſignified the Kingdomes of the Perſians, and the Medes: His hornes ſignified the Kings that were to reigne in thoſe Kingdomes; and that the laſt horne ſignified the laſt King, who ſhould ſurpaſſe all the reſt in riches and glory. That the Goat ſignified, that there ſhould come a certain King among the Greeks, who ſhould fight at two ſeverall times with the Perſian, and ſhould overcome him in warre; and afterwards poſſeſſe the whole government: And that by the great horne

horne that grew in the front of the Goat, the first King was represented; and how that after G
The yeer of the world. 3425. before Christs Nativity. 539. he was taken away, foure other should spring thereout. And whereas every one of these turned themselves toward the foure corners of the world, it was a signe that after the death of the first, he should have foure successors, that should part the Kingdome between them, who neither should be his allies or children; yet such notwithstanding as should command the world for many yeers: That from them, there should arise a certain King, that should oppose himself against the Hebrew Nation, and their laws, and should overthrow their policie, spoile their Temple, and be a let that for three yeers space the sacrifices should not be solemnized. Now so hath it hapned, that our Nation hath been so handled under Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseen, and hath written divers yeers before, all that which should happen.

Daniels predictions of the Romane Empire Dan. 9 pertotum At the same time Daniel wrote as touching the Empire of the Romanes, how it should H destroy our nation: and hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them unto him; so that they who read and consider those things that have hapned; admire Daniel for the honour that God dignified him with, and finde thereby that Epicures erre, who drive all divine providence from humane life, and affirme that God governeth not the affaires of the world; or that the world is administred by a happy and incorruptible essence, which causeth all things to continue in their being: but say, that the world is managed by it selfe, by casualty, without any conductor, or such a one that hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a soveraign Governour (as we see ships destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the windes; and charriots that have no drivers to conduct them, to beate one against another) even so should it perish, and should ruinate it selfe by such an irregular I motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I judge, that they are far estranged from the truth, that affirme that God hath no care of humane affaires; for if we see that all things happen casuall, then happen they not according to his prophecie. But I have written hereof according as I have found and read: and if any one will think otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long as him lift.

Cyrus King of Persia dismisseth the Iews from Babylon, and permitteth them to return into their countrey, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

B THE first yeer of the reign of Cyrus (which was the seventieth after that our Nation was translated from Judæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captivitie and calamitie of his poore afflicted people: and even as he had foretold them before the destruction of the Citie, that after they had served Nabuchodonosor and his posteritie for seventie yeers, he would again restore them to their Countrey wherein they were born, where they should build a Temple, and enjoy their former felicitie, so brought he it to pass.

The end of the Babylonian captivitie, after seventie yeers.

Ezra 1 principium.

The edict of Cyrus king of Persia.

For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus, and made him write his Letters thorow out all Asia to this effect: Thus saith the King Cyrus, since the Almightie God hath made me King of the whole world, I am perswaded that it is he whom the Iewish Nation do adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was born, and hath said, that I should build his Temple in Jerusalem, which is in the Countrey of Judæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading C of a Book of Prophesie, written by Esay, two hundreth and ten yeers before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reveal these things unto him, speaking to this effect; I will that Cyrus, whom I have declared King over many Nations, shall send my people back into their Countrey of Judæa, and shall build my Temple. These things did Esay foretell one hundreth and fourtie yeers before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being ravished in admiration of the Majestie of God) was surprized with an affection and zeal to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them license, to return into their Countrey, and to repair the City of Jerusalem, and erect the Temple of God; promising them that he himself would assist them. And to that effect he wrote unto his Governours, D and Princes of those Countries that confined upon Judea: charging them to contribute both gold and silver towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with cattel for the sacrifice. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, with all the Levites and Priests departed thence, and repaired to Jerusalem: Nevertheless, divers of the Iews remained in Babylon, in that they were loth to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soon as they came unto the Kings friends they afforded them both favour and aid, and furnished them with necessary matter to build the Temple, some of them with gold, other some with silver, and the rest with a certain number of oxen and horses: Thus payed they their vowes unto God, and offered sacrifices according to the ancient custome, as if the citie had been new builded again, and the E ancient service of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them back also those vessels consecrated to God, which King Nabuchodonosor had sent unto Babylon after he had spoyled the Temple; and delivered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to Abassars hands, who should have the custody thereof, untill the Temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliver them to the Priests and Princes of the people, to be restored again to the service of the Temple. He sent Letters also to the Governours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King to Sisine, and Sarabasame health. I have permitted those Iews that inhabite my countrey, to return into their native "countrey, and to reedifie their City, and erect the Temple of God in Ierusalem, in the "same place where it stood before. I have also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel F "the Prince of the Iews, with expres charge and authoritie, to lay the foundations of the "same, and to build it sixty cubits in height, and as many in breadth; making three lies of "hewen stone, and another of such timber as the countrey affordeth; the Altar likewise, "whereupon they may offer sacrifice unto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of "all these things come out of my coffers. I have also sent back those vessels which "Nabuchodonosor took out of the Temple, and have delivered them to the treasurer Mithri-"dates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Iews, to be conveighed to Ierusalem, and restored "to the Temple of God: the number whereof I have hereunder subscribed. Fifty lavers of "gold, and four hundreth of silver; fifty pots of gold, and four hundreth of silver; fiftie golden "lieves, and five hundreth of silver; thirty Ewers of gold, and three hundreth of silver; thirty

The Governours of the King do hinder the building of the Temple.

WHilest these men laid the foundations of the Temple, and were very affectionately busie about the building thereof, the Nations that bordered upon them, and in especial the Chutheans (whom Salmanazar King of Assyria sent from Persia and Media to inhabite in Samaria, at such time as he translated the people of the I ten Tribes) incited the Princes and Governours, to interdict the Iews for raising and building their Citie, and reedifying the Temple. Who corrupted with silver, sold their negligence, and delay to the Chutheans, which they used in those buildings. For Cyrus intending his other warres, was ignorant hereof, and having conducted his Army against the Massagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finish his life. When as therefore Cambyses his son had obtained the kingdome, they of Syria and Phœnicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans wrote their Letters to Cambyses in these terms:

Hedio & Russinus chap. 2. Eid. 4. 2. ad 11. The Samaritans inhibit the Jews from building the Temple. Alias chap 3. v. 11, ad 17. The Letters of the Samaritans and others, written to Cambyses, as touching the reedifying of the City, and Temple of Jerusalem.

O King, thy servants, Rathymus the Secretarie, Semelius the scribe, and those men that are Counsellers in Syria and Phœnicia, give thee to understand, that those Jews that were led captive into Babylon, are returned back into this country, and do build a wicked and rebellious Citie, and K repair the places and walls of the same, and reedifie their Temple likewise. Know therefore, that if these things be permitted to be finished, that they will no more endure to be thy subjects and tributaries, but will oppose themselves against their Kings, holding it more fit to command, then to obey. We have therefore thought good, that whilest they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their Temple, to write unto your Majestie, to the intent you may not neglect to examine your fathers Records, wherein you shall always finde that the Jewes have been Rebels, and enemies to their Kings; and that the Citie hath been for this cause laid desolate untill this present. We have thought good to signifie thus much to your Majestie, which perhaps is unknown unto you, because that if this Citie be once more re-inhabited and inclosed with a wall, your way is shut up L from passing into Cœlosyria and Phœnice.

Cambyses inhibiteth the Iews to build the Temple.

WHen Cambyses had read this Letter (in that he was by nature both wicked and malicious) he grew inwardly jealous and displeased at the contents thereof, and wrote back again after this manner: "The King Cambyses to Rathymus the Secretary of his casual events, and to Belsen and Semelius Scribes, and to all his other Coun- M
"sellers and inhabitants in Samaria and Phœnicia, Health. Having read your Letters, I have "commanded the Records of mine Ancestors to be examined, and I find that the Citie of "Ierusalem hath been always enemie to their Kings, and that the Inhabitants thereof have "always raised sedition and wars. I have likewise found, that their Kings have been mighty, "and violent, and that they have vexed Syria and Phœnicia with continuall Tributes. For "this cause I have ordained, that the Iews shall not be permitted to re-edifie their citie, for "fear lest their malice should augment by such occasion which they have continually used against their Kings. Incontinently after the receit and reading of these Letters, Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and those of their faction, took their horse, and rode hastily to Ierusalem, leading with them a great number of people, prohibiting the Iews from the building

A building either of their City or Temple. Thus was this work interrupted until the second year of the reign of Darius King of Persia, for the space of nine years. For Cambyses reigned six years, during which time he subdued Egypt, and upon his return from thence, he died in Damasco. And after the death of Cambyses, the Magi that held the Empire of the Persians for the space of one year being taken away, the seven families of Persia made Darius (the son of Hystaspis) King.

Darius the son of Hystaspis causeth the Temple to builded.

B THis Darius, during the time that he lived a private life, made a vow unto God, that if he obtained the kingdom, he would send back unto the Temple of Jerusalem all those vessels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the same time, Zorobabel, who was appointed Governour over the Captive Jews, came unto him from Jerusalem. For he was the Kings ancient friend: for which cause he with the other two were chosen to be of his guard; and obtained thereby that honour which he expected. The first year of the reign of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pomp and magnificence, both those of his household, as they also that were his Governours and Princes of Media and Persia, and the Commanders in India confining upon Æthiopia, with all the Chief-

Now after they had made good cheer, and were full of wine, they departed each of them unto their lodgings, to betake themselves to rest: But King Darius laid in his bed, reposed very little all the night long, but passed the time without sleep: for which cause seeing he could take no rest, he began to devise and discourse with three of his guard, promising him that should most truly and aptly answer those questions that he should demand, to grant him license in way of reward to wear a purple garment, and to drink in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, and to ride on a chariot harnessed with gold, and to bear the Tiara or linen wreath, and wear a golden chain about his neck, and sit in the next place to the King; and should likewise be called his kins-

D man in regard of his wisdome. After he had made these large promises, he demanded of the first, whether wine were the strongest? of the second, whether the King were stronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the most strongest of the three? As soon as he had delivered them these questions to deliberate upon, he laid him down to rest. Upon the next morrow he sent for the Princes, Chieftains, and Governours of Persia and Media, and afterwards sitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accustomed to determine the differences amongst his subjects, he commanded those three young men of his guard, in the presence of that Princely assistance, publickly to yield the resolution of those questions he had proposed unto them.

E Whereupon the first of them began after this manner to express the force of wine. "Noble Princes, when I consider the force of wine, I find nothing that may surmount the same: "for wine intangleth and deceiveth the understanding, and maketh the Princes understanding like to the poor mans, who is abandoned; & giveth the slave that freedom in discourse, "which appertaineth to men of greatest liberty: It maketh the poor resemble the rich: it "changeth and transformeth the soul, asswageth the miserable mans grief, and maketh the "indebted forget their bonds, and to think themselves very rich; so that they ruminate on "no abject things, but talk of talents, and such things as appertain unto the richer sort, it cau-"seth them to lose all apprehension both of Princes and Kings, and taketh from them the "remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth them against their greatest friends, "and maketh them suppose their neareſt wel-willers to be strangers; and when the wine "concocted by night and sleep hath forsaken them, they rise and know not what things they

"When the first of them had in this sort declared his resolution, as touching wine, he was "silent; and the next began to speak of the Kings force, shewing that it was of mighty conse-"quence, and more powerful then any other thing that seemeth to have force and intelli-"gence; and thus handled he the subject of his demonstration. Kings (saith he) have domi-"nion over men, who have the ability to inforce the earth, at their pleasure can command "the sea to serve them: Kings have power and dominion over those men who master and "command the untamed and mightiest creatures, it therefore appeareth that their force and "puissance exceedeth all these. If they command their subjects to wage war, and to expose "themselves to danger, they are obedient: and if they send them out against their enemies,

The second extolleth the Kings power, 3 Esd 4.

"they willingly obeyed them by reason of their force: By their ordinance they level moun- G
"tains, beat down wals, and raze towers. And if they command their subjects to kill or to be "killed, they resist not, for fear left they should seem to transgress the Kings commande"ment. When they have obtained the victory, all the glory and profit of the war redoun-
"deth unto the King. They likewise that bear no arms, but intend the tillage of the earth, "after they have travelled and supported all the toile of their tillage, reap and gather the "fruits, to the end to pay the King his tribute: And if he will or command any thing, it "must needly be performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore when the "King is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enjoy his pleasant and delightful rest,
"during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were "tied unto him, through the fear and aw they have of him: For not one of them dare for- H "sake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their own affairs, but intend "those services only which he thinketh necessary, which is the guard of his person. Who "therefore will not esteem the Kings forces to be greater then any others, since so many people obey him in whatsoever, and whensoever he commandeth?

Zorobabel, the third, expresseth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palme unto truth.

After he had spoken to this effect, Zorobabel, who was the third, began to justifie in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner: "True it is, that wine hath much force, and
"no less true that all men obey the King; yet far more mighty is the power of a woman.
"For by a woman the King was bred, and brought into this world, & those men that plant
"the vineyards where wines do grow, are born and nourished by women; and generally
"there is not any thing which we enjoy not by them. For they weave us garments, they have "the care and custody of our houses; neither is it possible for us to be severed from women. I "Yea, they that possess much gold and abundance of silver, and other things of great and in"estimable price; only upon the sight of a fair woman forsake all these things, and will fol"low after the beauty which they beheld, and for onely possession thereof, content them"selves to lose all things. We forsake likewise our father and mother, and the countrey that "hath bred us, and forget our friends for our wives sake; yea, we will willingly content our "selves to die with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonstration of the most migh"ty power of a woman. For whatsoever we travel for, all the pains that we endure both by "land & sea, to the intent we may reap some fruits of our labours, do we not carry all this to "give unto our wives, as unto those who were our mistresses? I have seen the King like"wise, who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the ear, by Apame the daughter of Rhapsaces K
"his concubine, and patiently endure when she took the Diadem from his head, and set it on "her own. When she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased he was displeased:
"and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his affection
"to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilst the Princes in way admiration beheld one another, he began to discourse of truth, saying: "I have already declared what the force of women is; yet notwithstanding both the "King and they are more feeble then truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mighty, the "heaven likewise of an immeasurable height, and the sun of unspeakable celerity; and where-
"as the will of God both governeth and moveth these things (because God is just and true) L "it therefore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of all things; against which, injus"tice may no wayes prevail. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seem to be "of value, yet are they mortal and of little continuance: but truth is immortal and everlast"ing. Moreover, all those things which we receive thereby, are neither mortal, neither sub"ject to the injuries of time, fortune, or alteration: but continue just and lawful, and separa"ted from all stain of injustice. When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse: Whereupon, all the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most value, and that only verity had an immutable force, and an indeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to ask what he would, as touching that M which he had promised to give, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wisest, and best learned amongst the rest. For (said he) thou shalt sit henceforth next unto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

Zorobabel obtained both praise and great rewards by his good discourse.

Ezra 1. and 5. Darius being put in memory of his vow, commandeth that the Temple should be restored. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4.

When the King had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vow that the King had made, if so be at any time he obtained the kingdom: namely, that he would build Jerusalem, and the Temple of God, and restore those vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O King, is my request which you permitted me to ask, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was judged wise and well lettered by you. The King took great pleasure at these words of his, and rising from his Throne, kissed him. He wrote also to his Governours and Princes, that they should

A should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the Temple. Moreover, he sent letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, commanding them to cut down the Cedars of Libanus, and to send them to Ierusalem towards the building of the Citie; publishing a Law, that all Iews should be made free, if so be they would resort unto Iudæa; forbidding all commissaries and Princes, to impose any charge upon the Jews, for the necessities of the kingdome; permitting that all the Countrey which they might occupie, might be inhabited by them, and exempt from Tributes: commanding the Idumæans, Samaritans, and Cœlosyrians to restore those lands unto the Jews which they unlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And besides that, to deliver them in way of contribution fiftie talents of silver towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary sacrifice. He likewise commanded that all the necessaries and vestments, which either the B high Priest, or the ordinary sacrificers used in the service of God, should be furnished at his charges. He willed also that the Levites should have instruments of Musick delivered unto them, to praise God with; and that certain portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the Citie, and the Temple. Moreover, he allowed them a certain summe of money every yeer for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he sent back all those vessels which Cyrus before-time had resolved to restore unto Jerusalem.

Darius Letters for the libertie, possession and erection of the Temple, granted to the Jews. 1 Esd. 6. v. 7, 8, ad 16.

When Zorobabel had obtained these things above named at the Kings hands, he issued out of the palace, and lifting up his eyes unto heaven, he began to give God thanks for the wisedom and victory he had granted him, & for the good succes he had given him in Darius presence. For (said he) O Lord, if thou hadst not been favourable unto me, I had not obtained C it. After he had at this time, and in this sort given thanks for the present, and prayed God to shew himself alwayes favourable hereafrer, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countreymen what good news he had received from the King: who hearing the same, gave God thanks also, who had restored them once more to the possession of that countrey wherin they were born: and they fell to feasting and banquetting for seven dayes space, for the restoring unto their countrey, as if they had solemnized the feasts of their birthdayes. Anon after they made choice of those Governours and common sort, that (with their wives, their children and horses) should return unto Ierusalem, who by the assistance of Darius convoy, performed that journey to Ierusalem with joy and consolation; playing on their Psalteries, Flutes, and D Cymbals; and were after this manner conducted on their way, with delight, by the number of those Iewes that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward, being a certain and determinate number of every family. I have not thought it meet to repeat these families name by name, for fear I should confound my Story, and lest the Readers should any wayes be distracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithstanding, the whole number of those that went, and were above twelve years old of the tribes of Juda, and Benjamin, were four millions, six hundreth twentie and eight thousand. There were likewise foure thousand and seventie Levites: And of their wives and children together, fourtie thousand, seven hundreth, fourtie and two. Besides these, there were of Singers of the Tribe of Levi, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters, one hundred and ten; and of sacred servants E three hundreth twenty and two. There were certain others likewise, that pretended that they were of the race of the Israelites, yet could not they give testimony of their descent; the number of whom was six hundreth fiftie and two Of the number of the Priests, they that had espowsed wives (whose genealogie could not be derived, and who were not found also in the genealogies of the Priests and Levites) they were about five hundreth, twenty and five. The multitude of servants that followed or attended on them, were seven thousand, three hundreth thirty and seven. There were also two hundreth, fourty rnd five Singers of men and women: foure hundreth, thirty and five Camels; and five hundreth twentie and five other beasts to carry their carriage. The Conductor of this above named multitude, was Zorobabel the son of Salathiel, descended of Davids line, and of the Tribe of Juda; and Jesus the son of Josedech the high Priest; besides which were Mordochæus and Serabæus, who were chosen F by the people to be their Governours, who contributed one hundreth pounds of gold, and five hundreth of silver. Thus the Priests and Levites, and a part of all the people of the Iews which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Ierusalem; the other part of them following a little after, returned every one into his own countrey.

end they might offer lawful ſacrifices thereon, according to Moſes Law: in which action of G theirs, they yielded little content to their neighbour Nations, who in generall were incenſed againſt them. They celebrated alſo at that time the feaſt of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker had ordained: afterwards they offered oblations, and continuall ſacrifices, obſerving their Sabbaths and all holy ſolemnities. And they that had made any vowes, performed the ſame, and ſacrificed from the new moon untill the ſeventh moneth. After this they began to build the Temple, and delivered great ſums of money to the hewers of ſtone, and Maſons; and gave ſtrangers their ordinary diet, who brought them ſtone and timber. For it was an eaſie matter for the Sidonians, and an act well pleaſing unto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to bind it, and gathering it together in rafters to ſhip it, and land it at the Port of Joppa. For Cyrus had before-time given them that command- H ment, and now the ſecond time they were injoyned thereunto by Darius.

C. 3. v. 4, 5. The feaſt of Tabernacles.

The Temple began to be built, v. 8.

The ſecond year after their arrival in Jeruſalem, the Iews aſſembled together in the ſecond moneth, and the building of the Temple went forward; ſo that having laid the foundation thereof in the firſt day of December, they builded upon the ſame, the ſecond year. Over this work thoſe Levites that were above twenty years of age, were overſeers: with them alſo was Jeſus, and his ſons and brothers joyned, and Zolimiel the brother of Juda the ſon of Aminadab, and his ſons. And through the diligence that theſe overſeers of the Temple uſed, it was ſooner finiſhed, then it was expected. As ſoon as the Sanctuary was builded, the Prieſts apparelled in their accuſtomed habits, and the Levites, and the ſonnes of Aſaph aroſe, and with Trumpets prayſed God, according as David firſt of all had ſet down the I manner of his ſervice. The Prieſts and Levites with the Elders of the Tribes, calling unto their minds how great and precious the firſt Temple was, and beholding that which was builded upon the preſent, far inferiour to the precedent, and perceiving how much the ancient wealth and dignitie of the Temple was abaſed; they were confuſed thereat, and being unable to overcome their paſſion, they burſt out into lamentations and tears. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any eſtimate or mention of the former Temple, they tormented not themſelves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they upon the difference and bigneſs betwixt the preſent, and that which ſtood in times paſt: yet notwithſtanding, the Elders lamented, and the Prieſts complained, that the new erected Temple was far leſs then the former; yet the noiſe of the trumpets K drowned their laments, and the joyfull applauſes of the people their mournings.

The Samaritans hearing the noiſe of the trumpets, ran out to know the cauſe thereof, in that they were lewdly affected toward the tribe of Juda and Benjamin; and underſtanding that the Iews which were returned from Babylon, had reedified the Temple, they addreſſed themſelves to Zorobabel and Jeſus, and to the chief Governours of the families, requiring them that it might be lawfull for them to repair the Temple with them; and to have part in the building thereof. For (ſaid they) we honour God no leſs then you, we pray unto him, and adore him; we conform our ſelves to your cuſtomes, ever ſince the time that Salmanazar King of Aſſyria removed us out of Chuthea and Media hither. To theſe demands of L theirs, Zorobabel and Jeſus the high Prieſt, and the Governours of the tribes anſwered, that it was impoſſible for them to admit their aſſiſtance in the building of the Temple, for that they had received their firſt commandment from Cyrus to perform the ſame, and afterwards from Darius: notwithſtanding, they gave them licence to adore therein, offering them that the temple ſhould be common to both, if they pleaſed: yea, and acceſſible to all other nations, that would repair thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for ſo were the Samaritans called) hearing this anſwer, were ſore offended; and perſwaded the other Nations of Syria, to require the Princes (who continued their authoritie ſince the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyſes time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Iews, who were ſo intent and buſie in their work. Whereupon Siſin Governour in Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came unto Ieruſalem; and demanded of the M Chieftains of the Iews, by whoſe permiſſion they builded the Temble, which rather ſeemed to be a Fort then a Temple, and for what cauſe they fortified their Citie with gates and ſo ſtrong walls? Zorobabel and Jeſus the high Prieſt anſwered, that they were the ſervants of the living God, and that their Temple had been built by one of their Kings, who was opulent, and ſurpaſſed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable eſtimation; but by reaſon their fathers had committed impietie againſt God, Nabuchodonoſor King of Babylon and Chaldæa, having taken the Citie by force, deſtroyed the ſame; and after he had ſpoyled the Citie, he burned it, and tranſported the people captive into Babylon.

A But after that Cyrus King of Perſia had obtained the Kingdome of Babylon, he commanded by his expreſſe letters ſealed with his royall ſeale, that they ſhould reedifie the Temple, and ordained that all that which Nabuchodonoſor carried from thence, as well gifts as veſſels, ſhould be delivered to Zorobabel and the Treaſurer Mithidrates, to be conveighed to Jeruſalem, and be placed again in the Temple, as ſoon as it ſhould be builded. And he commanded alſo, that it ſhould be preſently reedified, willing Abaſſar to repaire to Jeruſalem, and give order for all that which was requiſite; who reſorting thither as ſoon as he had received Cyrus letters, did ſpeedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward untill this preſent it hath been continued; but the ſubtiltie and the malignitie of their enemie had wrought ſo much, that as yet it remained imperfect. If therefore it pleaſe you, and you think it good, ſignifie that you heare, by your letters to Darius, to the end that examining the regiſters of B the Kings, he may finde that we are not faulty in any thing of that which we have ſaid. When Zorobabel and Ieſus had anſwered to this effect; Siſin and they that acccompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, untill ſuch time as they had certified Darius hereof, for which cauſe they wrote unto him preſently. Hereupon the Jews were much diſcomforted and troubled, fearing leſt the King ſhould change his minde in reſpect of the building of Jeruſalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongſt them) began to perſwade them, willing them to fear no dyſaſter from the Perſians, becauſe God had aſſured them: for which cauſe the people gave credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

But when he had read Siſins letters and his aſſociates, he commanded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the Kings ſhould be ſearched, how the matter had paſt; and there was found in Ecbatane a citie of the Medes, in a tower a certain book, in which theſe things were written. " The firſt yeer of the reign of Cyrus, commandement was given to build the " Temple of Jeruſalem, and the Altar therein: It was likewiſe decreed, that the hight " of the Temple ſhould be ſixty cubites, and the breadth as many; three ſtories of hewed "
D ſtone, and one ſtory of the wood of that countrey: and it was ordained that the expence of " that building ſhould be deducted out of the Kings revenews. Moreover he commanded, that " reſtitution ſhould be made unto the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, of thoſe veſſels that were " taken away by Nabuchodonoſor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commiſſion to effect " all theſe things was given to Abaſſa Governour of Syria and Phœnicia and his companions, " to the end that they might depart from theſe places, and the Iews might be permitted to " build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile and building ſhould be " gathered out of the tributes of his countries, & that they ſhould furniſh the Iews with buls, " weathers, lambs goats, flower, oyle, and wine, and all other things which the Prieſts ſhould " think meet to offer ſacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preſervation of the "
E King of Perſia: commanding that they that ſhould tranſgreſſe or contradict this commandement of his, ſhould be laid hold on, and hanged on a Iibbet, and that their goods ſhould be confiſcate to the Kings uſe. Moreover he beſought God, that if any man went about to " hinder the building of the Temple, that he ſhould puniſh him, and ſtrike him, and reſtrain " his wickedneſſe thereby. When Darius had found theſe things written in his Panchartes " and Chronicles, he wrote back to Siſin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Siſin and Sarabazan, with their aſſociates; health. Now when the feaſt of unleavened bread (which is the feaſt of Eaſter) drew neer, in the firſt moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Niſan by the Hebrews, all the people of the townsround about Jeruſalem reſorted thither, and celebrated the feaſt; purifying both themſelves, their wives, and children, according to the ordinance of their forefathers: And after they had ſolemnized the feaſt called Eaſter, or the Paſſeover in the fourteen Moon, they banquetted for ſeven dayes ſpace, ſparing no coſt how great ſoever he were. They offered burnt offerings alſo, and ſacrifices of thankſgiving, acknowledging Gods goodneſſe that had brought them home into their native countrey, to live according to the laws of their forefathers, and had made them gracious in the King of Perſias eyes. Thus dwelled H they in Ieruſalem all in joy, ſacrificing and ſerving God with great affection, and living under the government of their Nobilitie. For the chiefeſt authoritie remained in the high Prieſts, untill the Aſmonæans obtained the Kingdome: for before the captivitie of Babylon, they were under the government of Kings, who began from Saul and Davids times, about ſome five hundreth, thirtie two yeers, ſix moneth, and ſo many dayes; and before their Kings certain Governours called Iudges reigned: and under this ſort of policy lived they more then five hundred yeers; from the death of Moſes and Ioſua. See here the eſtate of the Iews delivered from their captivitie, during the dayes of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mightie and malicious adverſaries, and did them many miſchiefs, truſting in their riches, and pretending themſelves to be the Perſians kinſmen, becauſe their originall I proceeded from thence. For they refuſed to pay that tribute, which the King had commanded them to diſburſe unto the Iews to make their ſacrifices, and had their Governours likewiſe affectionate and forward to further malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them miſchief, either in themſelves, or by others. For which cauſe, the Iews determined to ſend Embaſſadours unto King Darius, to accuſe the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and four others were ſent. As ſoon therefore as the King underſtood by theſe Embaſſadours, what crimes and accuſations they had brought againſt the Samaritanes, he diſpatched his letters, and addreſſed them to the Governours and Councell of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. King Darius to Tangara and Sambaba Governours of Samaria, to Sadrach and Bobelon, and to their companions our ſervants being in Samaria; health. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, Embaſſadours in the behalf of the K Iews, accuſe you to be perturbers of the building of their Temple; alleadging that you refuſe to diſcharge that, which by my decree you ought to furniſh them with, for the charge of the ſacrifices. My will is therefore, that upon the ſight of theſe letters, you deliver out of the royall treaſury in Samaria, appointed for the tributes, all that which ſhall be neceſſarie for them to perform their ſacrifices, upon the requeſts of the Prieſts, to the intent they let paſſe no day without ſacrifice and prayer unto God for me, and for the Perſians. The beneficence of Xerxes, Darius ſonne, towards the Iews.

Hedio & Ruffinus chap 5. 1 Eſdras 7. Xerxes King of Perſia. Eſdras learned in the law.

AFter Darius death, his ſonne Xerxes ſucceeded him, not onely as heir in the government of his Kingdome, but alſo as ſucceſſour unto his pietie and devotion towards God: for he no wayes changed thoſe inſtitutions of his fathers that concerned religious ſervice, but with great benevolence favoured all the Jews. During his reigne Ioacim the ſonne of Ieſus was high Prieſt: Amongſt them alſo that remained in Babylon, there lived an high Prieſt with the Iews in that place called Eſdras, a juſt man, and one of great reputation amongſt the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the Laws of Moſes, he obtained great friendſhip with the King. This man intending (with certain other Jews of Babylon) to make his repair unto Jeruſalem, beſought the King that he would vouchſafe to beſtow his letters of commendations to the Governours of Syria in his behalf. Whereupon the King wrote his letters patents of grace, certifying „ his favour towards Eſdras, to the Princes in thoſe parts, to this effect: Xerxes King of Kings, „ to Eſdras the high Prieſt, & Reader of the divine Law, health. It is decreed by me and ſe„ ven other of my Councel, that whoſoever in my Kingdome of the Iſraelites, their Prieſts, or Levites

N.Iam.2 1. ad 11. Xerxes favoureth the Jews.

A Levites will repair with thee unto Jeruſalem, he may freely perform the ſame with my good licence, and reviſit Judea according to the law of God; bearing with you thoſe preſents unto the God of Iſrael, which both I and my friends have vowed. I likewiſe give thee licence to take with thee all the gold and ſilver whatſoever, that any of thy nation living here in Babylon will offer up unto God, to buy offerings to be ſacrificed upon the Altar of thy God: and to make whatſoever veſſels of gold or ſilver, which either thou or thy brethren ſhall think meet. Thoſe ſacred veſſells alſo which are given thee, thou ſhalt dedicate unto thy God, and if there be ought elſe requiſite in this behalf, that according to thy wiſedome ſhalt thou provide, and the charges ſhalt thou receive out of my treaſury. I have alſo commended thee to the Treaſurers of Syria and Phœnicia; and have written to them, that whatſoever Eſdras the Prieſt and Reader of the Law of God ſhall require, they ſhall preſently
B deliver it him. And to the end that God may be favourable to me and my children, my will is that an hundred meaſures of wheat be given unto God, according to the law. I command you alſo that are Magiſtrates, that you exact nothing, neither impoſe any taxations on the Prieſts, Levites, ſacred ſinging-men, porters, or holy officers. But thou Eſdras (according to the wiſedome given thee from above) ſhalt appoint Judges, who ſhall in Syria and Phœnicia execute juſtice unto the people, according to the ſervice of the law. Teach thou likewiſe freely all ſuch as are ignorant, ſo that whoſoever violateth either Gods or the kings law, he may be fined, or elſe condemned to death, as not ſinning through ignorance, but of contumacy. Farewell.

C When Eſdras had received this letter, he was wonderfully contented, and began to adore God, confeſſing openly that it was he, who was the author of that favour he had received at the Kings hands: for which cauſe he ſaid, that the onely thankſgiving appertained to him. And after he had red this Letter unto the Iews that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the originall, but ſent the copy to all thoſe of his nation, being in the countrey of the Medes: who underſtanding of the Kings affection towards God, and his favour towards Eſdras, were very joyfull; and divers amongſt them took their goods and came unto Babylon, deſiring to return to Ieruſalem: but all the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leave their quiet dwelling there. For which cauſe it came to paſſe, that two tribes were un-D der the obedience of the Romans in Aſia and Europe: but the ten Tribes were on the other ſide of Euphrates, even untill this day; being many infinites of thouſands, whoſe number may not be comprehended. With Eſdras there departed a great number of Prieſts, Levites, Porters, Singing-men, and ſervants of the Temple. Now after that he had aſſembled thoſe of the captivity, that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſojourned there three dayes, he commanded them to ſolemnize a faſt, and to pray unto God for his preſervation, and that no evil might happen unto him; and that neither their enemies nor any other might do them any violence. For Eſdras had foretold the King, that God would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no convey of horſmen at his hand for his ſecurity. After E that they had recommended themſelves unto God, they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt moneth of the ſeventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and arrived in Jeruſalem in the fifth moneth of the ſame year. Whereupon he incontinently preſented unto the Treaſurers (who were of the race of the Prieſts) the ſilver that was conſecrated, namely, ſix hundred and fifty talents, of ſilver veſſel an hundred talents, of veſſel of gold twentie talents, of brazen veſſel (more precious then gold) weighing twelve talents. Theſe were the preſents of the King and his friends, and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

v. 16, 17, 18. Eſdras aſſembled the Jews that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras repaireth to Jeruſalem, and committeth the veſſels and other precious preſents to the Treaſurers hands.

When Eſdras had delivered theſe above named preſents unto the hands of the Prieſts, he offered burnt offerings unto God, according to the law, namely, twelve buls for the publick conſervation of the people, ſeventie two rammes and lambs, and twelve goats for the expiation of ſinne. And after them he delivered the Kings Letters to his Princes and F Governours in Cœloſyria and Phœnicia: who being conſtrained to execute that which was enjoyned them by the King, honoured the Nation of the Jews, and ſupplied them every wayes in their neceſſities. This counſel had Eſdras himſelf given of their departure. But in my opinion God (having regard of his wiſdome and integritie) did happily advance his deliberation.

Not long after this, there came certain men unto him, complaining that ſome of the people, Prieſts, and Levites had tranſgreſſed againſt the policy, and broken the Laws of the countrey, for that they had eſpouſed certain ſtrange women, and confounded the race of the Prieſts; requiring him that he would have an inward regard to Gods ordinances, for fear leſt he (conceiving a general hatred againſt them all) ſhould ſend them anew ſome grievous calamities. For which cauſe Eſdras devoured with ſorrow, incontinently rent his clothes, and tore his hair, and pulled his beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because the principals among the people had part in that offence. And for that he feared lest if he should command them to forsake their wives, and those children they had begotten by them, he should not be obeyed, he persisted in grief, and lay continually couched upon the ground. Whereupon, all those resorted unto him who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him for that which had hapned. Whereupon Esdras (raising himself from the earth, and lifting up his hands to heaven) said, that he was ashamed to look thereupon, because the offences of the people were so hainous; who had forgotten the inconvenience that had befallen their forefathers for their impieties, beseeching God that he would reserve some remainder and seed of the adversity and captivity, which at that time happened unto them, and that he would once more establish them again in Jerusalem their native countrey: that he would take compassion on them, and grant them pardon for those sinnes which at that present were committed by them: for which though they deserved death, yet hoped they in the mercies of God for their deliverance. Whilest thus both he and those that came unto him lamented round about him, with their wives and children, a certain man called Achonius, one of the principal men of Jerusalem, repaired unto him; and said, that they had sinned, because they had espoused strange women; and perswaded Esdras to adjure them all, to banish both them and the children begotten by them; wishing that they, who obeyed not the law, might be punished. Esdras (perswaded by these words) made all the Princes of the Priests, Levites, and Tribes of Israel sweare, that they would dismisse their wives and children, according to the counsell of Achonius. And as soon as he had received their oaths, he departed from the Temple unto Iohns house the sonne of Eliasib, and there spent he all the day without tasting any meat, by reason of the grief which so inwardly he had conceived.

Whence therefore it was published by Edict, that all they that were returned from the captivity, should repair within two or three dayes to Ierusalem (under the penalty that they, who defaulted therein, and came not within the prefixed time, should be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiscate to the publique treasury of the Temple, by the ordinance of the Priests:) they of the Tribes of Iuda and Benjamin came thither within three dayes, on the twentieth day of the ninth month, called by the Hebrews Thebeth, and by the Macedonians Apellæus. And as soon as they were seated in the upper part of the temple in the presence and assistance of the Elders, although the weather were very intemperate, by reason of the frost; Esdras arose and reproved them for that they had transgressed the law, in taking wives unto them, who were not of their nation: for which cause he told them that if they would perform a matter that were agreeable unto God, and profitable for themselves, they should dismisse such wives. Whereupon with a loud voice, they all cried, that they would do it willingly; but that there was no small number of them, and that the time was winter, and the matter of that consequence, as one or two dayes could not end it: For which cause they thoght it very needful, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, some of the Princes who were free from that sinne, with certain other chosen Elders of every place, should make inquisition of them that had married wives contrarie to the prescript of the law. Which being approved by them, about the new moon of the tenth moneth this inquisition began, which continued until the new moon of the moneth ensuing: and there were many of the family of Jesus the high Priest, and of the Priests, Levites, & Israelites, that (making more account of the observation of the laws, then of the natural affections to their wives and children) did presently put away their wives, and those children they had by them, and sacrificed certain rams for a peace-offering unto God: whose names it were as needless matter to reckon up in this place.

When Esdras had in this sort reformed the errour committed by such marriages, he so corrected the evil custome thereof, that this confirmation continued firm and irrevocable for ever. In the seventh moneth, they solemnized the feast of tabernacles: whereto when all the people were resorted, they all gathered togerther in an open place in the Temple towards the gate that looketh Eastward, requiring Esdras that he would read Moses ordinances unto them; which he performed, and standing up in the midst of the multitude, he read the law unto them from the morning until noon. By which reading, not onely for the present, but for the time to come, they learned that which was just; and also calling to memory that which was past, they were so discomforted, that the tears fell from their eyes, in thinking with themselves, that if they had kept the law, they had not suffered any of those evils, by which they had been tormented. But Esdras beholding them in that estate, willing each of them to repair homeward, and to weep no more, because that day was a solemn and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, because it was forbidden. He rather commanded them

A to intend their feasts and pleasures, assuring them that the repentance and grief of those faults that were committed by them in times past, ought to serve them and instruct them to assure and defence themselves, to the end that hereafter they commit not the like. They following Esdras exhortation, began to celebrate the solemnity, and continued their feasts in their Tabernacles during eight dayes. After which time they returned every one unto his house, praising God in hymnes; and thanking Esdras for the amendment of those unlawfull marriages that had happened in their policy: who after he had gotten great honour among the people, finished his life, being loaden with yeers, and was buried honourably in Jerusalem. About the same time also died Ioacim the high Priest, whose sonne Eliacim succeeded in his place.

After this it came to passe that a certain man that was one of the captive Jews, and King Xerxes Butler called Nehemias, walking before the citie of Susa (which was the Metropolitane citie of Persia) heard certain strangers that came from farre: who upon their entrie into the citie, devised the one with the other in the Hebrew tongue; for which cause he drew neer unto them, and asked them whence they came. Who returning him this answer, that they came from Judea: he began to demand of them again, of the estate of Jerusalem, their native City, and how the people fared. To whom they answered, that they were in very bad estate, and that their citie wals were converted to dust and razed, and that the nations round about them afflicted the Jews with many outrages, in making inrodes into their countrey, and spoiling them daily, not sparing them by night; so that divers of them were led away prisoners; yea some Citizens of Jerusalem, and that daily the high wayes were found full of dead bodies. Hereupon Nehemias began to weep (thorow the inward compassion he had of his distressed brethren) and looking up towards heaven: How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our nation thus afflicted without taking care of us? Behold how we are made a prey to all men. Whilest thus he walked before the gate, and lamented bitterly, news was brought him that the King was ready to sit down to his meat: For which cause he gave attendance according to his office, and served the King dutifully, during his time of repast. As soon as supper was done, the King grew pleasant & joyful, and casting his eyes upon Nehemias (whom he perceived to be heavie and disconsolate) he asked him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God to give him grace and perswasive speech to discourse unto the King) answered: O King, how is it possible that I should be other but discomforted, and that grief should not pierce even unto the very center of my soul, when I hear that the walls of Jerusalem (which is my native countrey) are levelled with the ground, and the sepulchres and monuments of my predecessors are defaced, and the gates of the Citie are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may resort thither, and repair the same, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

This said, the King gave eare to his request, and promised him his Letters, assuring him that he would addresse them to the Governours, commanding them to do him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessarie, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause (said he) cease thou to be sad, and do thy service willingly. Hereupon Nehemias adored God, and thanked the King, for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the pleasure he conceived, he cleared that confusion and sorrow that before that time he bare in his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gave him letters unto Sadeas the Governour of Syria, Phœnicia and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessarie for that building which he intended. As soon as he came to Babylon, he took divers of his countrey men with him, who willingly followed him, and went with him unto Jerusalem in the five and twentieth yeer of the reign of Xerxes, and after he had presented his letters before God, he delivered them to Sadeas, and the other Governours. Afterwards, assembling the people in Ierusalem, he stood up in midst of them, and spake unto the whole congregation to this effect: You men of Iury, there is none of you but knoweth that God hath our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in perpetuall memory, and that in regard of their justice, he hath never failed to have care of us: by his mercy likewise I have received the favour from the King to repair your wals, and finish the rest of the Temple. I therefore pray you (who are assuredly perswaded of the "envie and hatred the neighbouring Nations bear unto you, who hearing that we are intent "and busie in our building, will over-presse us, and labour by all means possible to hinder us) "first to assure your selves in Gods providence; who will oppose himself against the hatred "which they bear us, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in prosecution of the "building, but with all care continue the work, in that the opportunitie of the time doth "challenge our diligence therein. After he had spoken to this effect, he gave order that the "

Governour

Governours should take the measure of the wall, and distribute the task among the people, according to the burroughs and towns, and according to every mans abilitie: and after he had promised to imploy both himself, and all his familie therein, he dismissed the assembly. Hereupon the Jews (incited by his authoritie) addressed themselves to the work; which name of Jews was first imposed both on them and their religion, by reason of the Tribe of Juda, who first of all came into these places. G

Nehem. 4. 1. ad 15.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Cœlosyria, understanding the walls were raised with such haste and diligence, were sore aggrieved, and resolved with themselves to lie in ambush, and to hinder them in their deliberations; so that they slew divers Jews, and sought the means likewise to murther Nehemias himself: and having hired certain strangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in wait for him. They bred also a fear and trouble amongst them, by spreading certain rumours, that divers nations intended to make warre against them: by which reports (being too much distracted) they desisted somewhat in the prosecution of their building. Yet none of these things could weaken Nehemias diligence or resolution, but that (keeping a court of guard round about him) he instantly prosecuted his purpose, setting light by all occurrents: so great was his affection to accomplish his intent. And for that cause did he carefully and intentively stand upon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he beleeved that after his departure the Jews would not finish the building of the wals. He commanded afterwards, that the workmen in their travell should have their furnitures fast by them, so that both Masons and labourers carried their swords. H

v. 16. ad finem. The ardent care in building the wals of Jerusalem.

Moreover, he gave order that they should have their targets by them; and he placed certain trumpetters, some five hundred foot distant the one from the other, charging them that as soon as they discovered the enemy from any part, they should incontinently sound the allarum, and give notice unto the people to arm themselves, and prepare for the fight, for fear they should be surprised and found naked. He himself also walked the round, about the City by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or sleeping at his pleasure, but onely for necessitie sake: and this labour endured he for the space of two yeers, and three moneths: for the wall of Jerusalem was builded again in that time, in the eight and twentieth yeer of the reigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered sacrifices unto God, and spent eight dayes in feasting. When the rumour was spread abroad that this building was finished, the inhabitants of Syria were sore displeased. But Nehemias perceiving that the Citie was weakly manned, besought the Priests and Levites to forsake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he builded them houses upon his own charge. He ordained likewise, that they that intended their husbandry, should bring the tenths of their fruits unto Jerusalem, to the intent that the Priests and Levites by enjoying their continuall maintenance, might intermit no time in the service of God: wherein he was willingly obeyed. By this means, the City of Jerusalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably executed divers other worthy actions deserving praise, he died at such time as he was loaden with age. He was a man of good nature, just and highly affectionated towards his countrey: he left the City of Jerusalem incompassed with a wall, for a perpetuall memory of his love unto his countrey. All these things happened during the reigne of Xerxes. I K L

How during the reigne of of Artaxerxes, the whole Nation of the Iews were in danger to be extinguished by Amans teachery.

Hedio & Rufinus, hap. 6. Esther 1. 1.

AFter the death of Xerxes, the Kingdome fell to Cyrus his sonne, who by the Grecians was called Artaxerxes. Under his government all the race of the Jews, both men, women and children, were in danger to be utterly exterminated: the cause whereof I will hereafter declare. But first of all it behoveth me to speak somewhat of the King, and declare how it came to passe, that he married an Hebrew woman of the bloud royall, by whose means (as it is said) our nation was preserved. M

The year of the world, 3543. before Christs Nativity, 421.

After that Artaxerxes had taken the Kingdome upon him, and established Governours over one hundred and seven and twenty Provinces, from India as farre as Æthiopia; in the third yeer of his reigne, he entertained and feasted all his friends with great magnificence, the nations of Persia likewise with their Governours (according as it became a King so opulent, who

A who as prepared for one hundred and eighty dayes to make ſhew of his wealth and bountie.) He feaſted after this, for the ſpace of ſeaven daies the Embaſſadours of all nations in the city of Suſa: and the ſetting forth of the banquet was ſuch, as enſueth. He ſate in a Tent, whoſe pillars were of Gold and ſilver, covered with linnen and ſcarlet vails, which were of that greatneſſe, that divers thouſands of men might take their refection therein. All the cates were ſerved in veſſels of Gold, inriched with precious ſtones very glorious to behold. The King likewiſe commanded his ſervants (that attended the feaſt) that they ſhould enforce no man to drink, by filling continually, according to the manner of the Perſians, but to permit every one of the gueſts to drink according to his diſcretion. He ſent alſo thorowout

B all the Countrey, commanding a ceſſation from all labour, and that every one ſhould make holiday for many dayes in honour of his royalty. The Queen Vaſthi alſo made a banquet unto her women in the royal Palace. Now whereas the King was deſirous to ſhew the majeſty of his Queen to thoſe he had invited, he ſent unto her, commanding her to reſort unto the banquet in more royal manner then the reſt of her attendants: but ſhe too curiouſly tied to the obſervation of the law of the Perſians (which forbiddeth women to be ſeen by ſtrangers) went not unto the King: and notwithſtanding he ſent his Eunuchs divers times unto her, yet perſiſted ſhe in her refuſal to come unto him. Whereupon the King (moved with diſpleaſure) gave over his banquet, and ariſing therefro, he called unto him his ſeven Counſellers, to whom (according to the uſe of the Perſians) it belonged to expound the

C Laws; and accuſed his wife, telling them how grievouſly he had been wronged by her, for that being ſent for by him divers times to accompany him at his banquet, ſhe had every way refuſed to obey him: he therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what puniſhment appertained to her. One amongſt them called Mucheus anſwered, that the injurie was not onely offered unto him, but to all the Perſians: who being after that manner deſpiſed by their wives, were like to paſſe their lives ignominiouſly, for that no one of them would acknowledg duty towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queens diſobedience, which ſhe ſhewed towards him, who was the Governour over all. Whereupon he concluded, that ſhe that had thus diſhonoured him, ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed: which done he thought it meet that this ordinance of the Kings might be publiſhed thorow all

D Nations, that Queen Vaſthi ſhould be ſeparated from his bed, and another woman choſen in her place. But the King who vehemently loved her, and could hardly endure to be ſeparated from her, knowing that he could not keep her contrary to law, was wholly devoured in ſorrow, for that he might not be maſter of that which he deſired. Which when his familiars perceived, they counſelled him to forget the memory and love of a woman ſo unprofitable, and to ſend and ſeek out thorow all his countries for the faireſt woman amongſt them, whom he might chuſe and take to wife, that ſurpaſſed all others in beauty; for that by the interview and company of another woman, the great affection which he bare unto Vaſthi, might be extinguiſhed. The King allowing and ratifying this counſel of theirs, ſent out certain meſſengers and deputies, commanding them to bring unto his preſence the

E faireſt Virgins that were to be found in his Kingdome: when as therefore they had aſſembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young Orphelin (without either father or mother) who was brought up under her Uncle (whoſe name was Maraocheus) of the Tribe of Benjamin, and one of the greateſt men amongſt the Jews. It came to paſſe, that this Eſther (for ſuch was her name) was judged to be the faireſt amongſt the reſt, who for her amiable countenance, made all men to ſtand and gaze to behold her. She therefore was delivered in charge unto one of the Eunuchs, who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was poſſible, decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the cuſtome of noble women; and after this manner were four hundred Virgins entertained for the ſpace of ſix moneths. Now when he that was put in truſt with this commiſſion, thought theſe Vir-

F gins to be ſufficiently prepared, and that they deſerved to approach the Princes bed, he ſent every day one unto the King to keep him company: who after ſome embraces ſent her preſently back again unto the Eunuch. But when as Eſther came unto his preſence, he ſettled his affection more on her then on all the reſt, and being ſurpriſed with her love, he took her for his lawful wife: and the nuptials were ſolemnly celebrated in the ſeventh yeer of his reign, and in the twelfth moneth called by us Adar, and generally February: and he ſent poſts thorow all his kingdomes to proclaim a feaſt in honour of his marriage: he himſelf alſo feaſted the Perſians, and Medes, and the Princes of the Nations, for a whole moneths ſpace for the ſame cauſe. At ſuch time as Eſther entred into the royal Palace, he ſet a diademe upon her head, and ſo lived with her, that he never queſtioned with her either of her birth, or Nation. Her Uncle alſo came from Babylon to Suſa (the chief City Perſia) where

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodeſtes, two of the kings Eunuchs, had conſpired againſt him; Barnabazus, who was of the Hebrew Nation and one of their ſervants, diſcloſing their treaſon, diſcovered it to the Queens Uncle Mardocheus, who by her means made the king privy to their conſpiracy. Who, ſore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination, and after he had commanded them to be executed on the Gibbet, he for that time gave no recompence to Mardocheus for the ſafeguard of his life; he onely commanded his name to be regiſtred and Chronicled in his Commentaries, commanding that he ſhould attend in the Palace, and be eſteemed for one of the kings moſt inward friends. Now as often as Aman (the ſon of Amadath an Amalechite) came unto the Palace to viſit the king, all thoſe that were either Perſians or ſtrangers (according to the kings eſpecial direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus ſhewed him no honour (both by reaſon of that upright judgement that was in him, as alſo for that the laws of the Jewes forbad the ſame.) Which when Aman had obſerved, he demanded whence he was? and underſtanding that he was a Jew, he was much diſpleaſed, ſaying in himſelf, that the Perſians who were of freer condition, caſt themſelves proſtrate before him, and he that was but a ſlave diſdained to do the like. Intending therefore to revenge himſelf on Mardocheus, he thought it not ſufficient to procure his puniſhment at the kings hands, but reſolved wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capital enemy of the Jews, by reaſon that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his deſcent, had been wholy ruinated by them.) For which cauſe, he addreſſed himſelf unto the king, and accuſed them, ſaying, that there was a certain curſed nation „ ſpread through his whole kingdome inſociable, and abhoring the cuſtomes of other men „ who uſed divers laws and ceremonies hateful both for their manners and ſtudies, to all the „ reſt of his ſubjects, and all mortal men. This nation (ſaith he) if thou wilt do a gracious „ and acceptable favour unto thy people, thou ſhalt utterly extinguiſh, and leave neither cap- „ tive nor ſlave alive amongſt them. And leſt your Majeſties tribute would be any wayes im- „ paired by theſe means, I promiſe you of mine own revenews fourty thouſand talents of ſil- „ ver; deſiring rather willingly to forbear ſo much money, then that your kingdome ſhould „ be unpurged of ſuch a curſed race of men. When Aman had made this his requeſt, the king „ anſwered that he forgave him the money, and that he permitted him to deal with that Nation as beſt him liked. A good cheer, whileſt the Citie hung in ſuſpence, being troubled with the expectation of the event of that which ſhould follow. But Mardocheus having intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on ſackcloth, and caſt aſhes on his head, walking thorow the Citie, and crying that their nation had not committed any crime that deſerved death: and uſing theſe or ſuch like ſpeeches, he came unto the Kings Palace: and ſtood before the gate, becauſe it was unlawful for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like alſo did the Jews that were in the Cities, where thoſe Edicts had been publiſhed againſt them, weeping and lamenting their miſeries. But when the news hereof was brought unto the Queen, that Mardocheus ſtood before the Palace gate in a lamentable eſtate, ſhe was ſore troubled, and ſent certain of her ſervants unto him, to command him to exchange his attire, but they could not perſwade him to put off his ſackcloth, becauſe the inconvenience, for which he had put it on, was not

B over-paſt. She therefore called unto her, her Eunuch Acratheus, and ſent him unto Mardocheus, to know what hatefull accident had befalne him, that made him put on his deſolate habit, and powre forth thoſe lamentable tears (notwithſtanding, ſhe had inſtantly prayed him to diſrobe him of the one, and drie up the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch, of the Edict made againſt the Jews, and ſent by the King unto all his Provinces; the offer of the mony that Aman likewiſe had tendered to the King, whereby he had bought the utter ruine of his Nation at the Kings hands; moreover, he gave him the copie of that which had been proclaimed in Suſan, to be delivered unto Eſther: whom he commanded to beſeech the King, and to eſteem it no diſhonour to put on an abject and baſe garment, to ſave her

C Nation, and to preſerve the Iews from that death, whereunto at that time they were expoſed: for that Aman the next in honour to the King, had accuſed the Iews, and incenſed his Majeſty againſt them. When Eſther underſtood this, ſhe ſent again unto Mardocheus, giving him to underſtand that ſhe was not called for by the King; and that whoſoever entred unto him, and was not called, ſhould die, except the King would warrantize him by ſtretching out his golden Scepter; for he, unto whom the King intended that favour, although he were not called unto him, yet ſuffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When theſe things were reported by the Eunuch from Eſther unto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, that ſhe ought not ſo much to tender the particular reſpect of her life, as the lives of her whole Nation; aſſuring her, that if at that preſent ſhe had not care of them, their

D ſuccour ſhould onely proceed from God by ſome other means then this: but ſhe and her fathers houſe ſhould be deſtroyed by them whom ſhe had contemned. Upon this reply, Eſther ſent the ſame meſſenger back again unto Mardocheus, commanding him to repair unto Suſan, and to call a generall aſſembly of all the Iews that remained there, willing them for three dayes ſpace to faſt and abſtain from all kind of meat for her ſafety, and that both her ſelf and her ſervants would do the like, promiſing them that at that time ſhe would preſent her ſelf unto the King, notwithſtanding his contrary Edict; and that if ſhe muſt needs die, ſhe would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, cauſed the people to faſt, and to pray unto God for her: he likewiſe himſelf beſought him that it might pleaſe him at that preſent to

E have compaſſion on their deſolate and diſtreſſed Nation; as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as he had pardoned them at ſuch time as they had offended; ſo now alſo at this preſent he would deliver them from that perdition which was denounced againſt them. For that they were not in danger to die infamouſly for any offence of their own, but becauſe he onely had incenſed Aman unto diſpleaſure, in that he would not adore him, or perform that honour unto him, which is onely due to God: for which cauſe in deſpight he had imagined this thing againſt them, who would not tranſgreſs the divine ordinances. The people likewiſe prayed to the like effect, beſeeching God that he would have care of their preſervation, and warrantize the Iſraelites in what place ſoever they were, from the miſery at hand, which was before their eyes, and already expected by them. Eſther alſo beſought God (according to her countrey manner) caſting her ſelf proſtrate on the earth, clo-

F thed in ſackcloth, and abſtaining for three dayes ſpace from meat and drink, and what thing ſoever elſe was delectable, beſeeching God to have compaſſion upon her, that when ſhe preſented her ſelf before the King, ſhe might have words fit to perſwade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty far more amiable then ever ſhe had, to the end that by theſe two means ſhe might be the better enabled to appeaſe the King, if ſo be he were diſpleaſed againſt her; and to ſuccour her brethren agitated and toſſed in extreme danger, where-through the King might enforce his hatred againſt the enemies of the Jews, and take compaſſion of their imminent danger, which without his prevention would ſurely fall upon them. After ſhe had in this ſort for three dayes ſpace both faſted and prayed, ſhe caſt off her mourning attire, and changed her habit, attiring her ſelf like a majeſticall Queen, having two of her ſervants on whom ſhe leaned, and the third that followed her, carried up with the tops of her fingers her train, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came ſhe unto the King, having her cheeks ſtained with crimſon bluſhes, making ſhew of Majeſtie mixed with beautie, and not altogether eſtranged from fear. But when ſhe beheld the King ſitting aloft in his throne, glorious in his garments diſtinguiſht with gold, and adorned with pearl, and rich ſtones; a certain fear ſuddenly fell upon her, and by chance he had caſt a frowning and ireful look on her: whereupon being preſently aſtoniſhed her members failed her, her colour faded, and ſhe fell betwixt her handmaids armes in a ſwoune. Hereon, the King (by the will of God, as I verily eſteem) changed his affection; and (ſuſpecting leſt fear ſhould cauſe his wife to fall into ſome grievous accident) he ſuddenly leapt from his Throne, and embracing her with both his armes, he raiſed her up, and kiſſed her, and ſpake comfortable words unto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to ſuſpect any ſiniſter misfortune, for that ſhe came unto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was onely made for his ſubjects, for which cauſe he willed her (who was equall in government with him) to fear nothing: whereupon he took his Scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queens neck, (according to the law) enforcing himſelf to deliver her from all fear; by which means ſhe recovered her vigour and courage; and ſpake after this manner: O King (ſaid ſhe) I cannot eaſily expreſs unto you the inconvenience that is ſuddenly fallen upon me: For as ſoon as I beheld the great fair, and redoubted Majeſtie of your perſon, my ſpirits forſook me, and my heart failed me. Now whileſt ſhe ſpake theſe words with pain and feebleneſs, the King was touched with compaſſion; ſo as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (ſaid he) if thou demandeſt the half of my kingdome, I will grant it thee. But Eſther onely requeſted this at his hands, that onely he and his intire friend Aman would vouchſafe to grace her with their preſence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come unto the banquet, and in the midſt of their cups, the King commanded Eſther to ask what ſhe would, and he would grant it her, aſſuring her that he would refuſe her in nothing; yea, although ſhe demanded the half of his kingdome. But ſhe deferred to diſcover her ſuit untill the next day, requiring him once more to repair with Aman unto her banquet. When the King had promiſed to reviſit her, Aman departed with great joy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Eſther, and no other had ever obtained the like honour amongſt any Kings of that dominion. But in his return perceiving Mardocheus in the Court, he was ſore moved, becauſe that (notwithſtanding he had lookt upon him) he had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home unto his houſe, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour not onely the King, but the Queen alſo had done him; and how he only with the King had ſupped that day with the Queen; and was invited the next day alſo to banquet with the king: notwithſtanding he told them that he was diſcontented, becauſe he ſaw Mardocheus the Jew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he ſhould cauſe a gallows to be raiſed of fiftie cubits high, and that the next day he ſhould demand licence of the king, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the gibbet. Aman praying his wives counſell, commanded his ſervants to prepare the timber, and erect the Gallows in his Court, to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at Amans curſed hope, and knowing certainly what ſhould happen, took pleaſure to ſee it prepared. For the very ſame night he deprived the King of ſleep, who very loth to ſpend the time idlely whileſt he was awake, but to imploy it in ſomething that was profitable for his kingdome, he commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the kings his predeceſſors, and of thoſe things that were done by himſelf, and to read the ſame. When as therefore they were brought and read, he found that a certain man whoſe name was there ſet down, had received a great poſſeſſion for reward in reacknowledgement of his vertue. He read likewiſe of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelitie, and conſequently of others; till at laſt he came to the place where the Eunuchs Bagotheus and Theodeſtes were noted down for a ſecret conſpiracy againſt the perſon of the King; and how it was diſcovered by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretary (having onely recited this accident) turned over to another Hiſtory, the King ſtayed him, and asked him if he found therein written, that he had given any recompence to Mardocheus? He anſwered that he found nothing ſet down. Whereupon the King commanded him to give over, and inquired of thoſe to whom that Office appertained, what houre of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already diſcovered, he commanded that ſome one ſhould certifie him, which of his familiars attended before the Palace. At this time it chanced

A chanced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither ſooner then he was accuſtomed with an intent to beſeech the King, that it might be lawful for him to put Mordocheus to death.

Now when the officers had brought the King tidings that Aman was before the palace; they were commanded preſently to call him in. As ſoon as he came into the Kings preſence he ſaid unto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithee give me thy counſel, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatneſſe, whom I do moſt affectionately love? Aman thinking the advice he ſhould give, ſhould be given for himſelf (becauſe he ſuppoſed that he onely was beloved by the King more then all others) counſelled him that which in his opinion was the beſt, in this manner. For (ſaid he) if you intend to inveſt the man with glory, who (as you ſay) is beloved by you, cauſe him to be mounted
B upon a brave horſe, and let him be apparelled in a royal habit, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and let ſome one of thy chiefeſt friends march before him, and proclaim thorowout the City, that thus is the man honoured whom the king loveth. Aman gave this counſel, in that he hoped that it ſhould be his own fortune. But the King (highly contented with this his advice) turning towards him, ſpake thus unto him: Thou haſt an horſe, a garment, and a chain, ſeek out therefore the Jew Mardocheus; and give them him, and march thou before him, making this publick crie: For (ſaid he) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing be committed to thy truſt, which thou haſt ſo faithfully counſelled. And this command I to be done in this ſort; becauſe Mardocheus hath been the preſerver of my life. Aman hearing theſe words, beyond all expectation, was confuſed
C in his ſpirit, and being wholly diſcomforted, knew not which way to turn him, he therefore iſſued out, having with him the horſe, the purple habit, and the chain of Gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was clothed in ſackcloth, he enjoyned him to lay his mourning habit aſide, and to cloath himſelf in purple. But he (who was wholly ignorant of that which had happened, and ſuppoſing that he mocked him) ſaid: O thou wickedeſt man amongſt men, doeſt thou thus mock at our afflictions? Notwithſtanding, being afterwards informed that the King had beſtowed this honour on him for ſaving his life, and diſcovering the treachery of thoſe Eunuchs that would have ſlain him, he put upon him the ſcarlet habit that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chain about his neck, and afterwards mounting his horſe, he went round about the City: Aman alſo walking before him, and
D crying, that thus ſhould be dealt and done with him whom the King honoured, loved, and thought worthy of eſtimation. Now after they had circuited the whole City, Mardocheus gave his attendance on the King, but Aman came not in preſence; ſo much was he aſhamed at that which had happened: for which cauſe he repaired home, and told his wife and friends, with tears, of all that which had hapned; who told him, that it was no waies poſſible for him to revenge himſelf as yet on Mardocheus, becauſe God was with him.

Now whileſt they were diſcourſing and debating this matter together, Eſthers Eunuchs came to haſten Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadas one of the Eunuchs ſeeing the gibbet erected in Amans lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one of the ſervants, wherefore it was raiſed up: and underſtanding that it was for the Queens
E uncle, whom Aman would require at the Kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time he held his peace. But when the King being ſeated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queen to declare what ſhe would require that he might grant her, ſhe began to lament the danger of her people, ſaying, that ſhe with her whole Nation were made a prey to the ſword, and that for that cauſe ſhe brake out into that diſcourſe: For (ſaid ſhe) I had not troubled your Majeſty, neither had I been aggrieved, if you had commanded that all the Jews ſhould be ſold, and led away captives to extream miſery; for that affliction might have been born: ſhe therefore prayed him to redeem them from thoſe miſeries. When as therefore the King demanded who it was, that practiſed that tyranny, ſhe began publickly to accuſe Aman, ſaying, that he alone was that wretched and envious man, who had complotted their tragedy. Hereupon the King was very ſore troubled, and roſe from the ban-
F quet to depart into the garden: then began Aman to pray and beſeech Eſther to forgive him his offence, for that at that preſent he was in a dangerous eſtate. Now whileſt he was fallen upon her bed to beſeech her favour, the King entred, and grew the more diſpleaſed at that he ſaw, and ſaid, O thou curſed amongſt men, dareſt thou attempt to enforce my wife? Aman was wholly confounded with this queſtion; ſo as he had not a word to anſwer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadas ſtepping forth, accuſed him for that he had found him in his lodging erecting a gibbet for Mardocheus, aſſuring the King that one of his houſhold ſervants had told him it, at ſuch time as he was ſent to call him to the banquet; alledging moreover, that the gibbet was fifty cubits high. Which when the King understood, he adjudged Aman to no other death, but that which he intended against Mardocheus; and thereupon presently commanded that he should be hanged upon the same gibbet, untill he were dead. And in this place it behoveth me to admire the Majestie of God, in considering what his wisdome and justice is, in that he not onely punished the wickedness of Aman (as he had deserved) but also caused him to fall into the same snare which he had prepared for another man. Thus died Aman, who had unjustly abused the Kings friendship: as for his goods, they were given unto the Queen. G

Hester 8. 1, 2. Amans goods bestowed on Mardocheus.

After this, the King called for Mardocheus unto him (for already he had notice that he was his wifes uncle) and gave him the ring which he had given unto Aman: the Queen likewise gave him his goods, and required the King to deliver the Nation of the Jewes from that dismay whereinto they were fallen, through the peril of their lives: letting him to see those letters which were sent by Aman the Amadathite thorow all his countreys, assuring him that she could not live to behold the death of her brethren, and the total ruin of her countrey. The King assured her, that he had undertaken nothing that might discomfort her: avowing to her, that he would not contradict her will, wishing her to write her self in the Kings name all that which she would have done in the behalf of the Jews; promising that when she had done the same, he would seal it with his own seal, giving her authority to send the same thorow all his Realms: to the end that they that read those Letters, confirmed by the Kings seal, should not any wayes contradict the execution of the same. Whereupon he sent for his Secretaries of estate, commanding them to write unto the Magistrates of all the Nations as touching the Jews, and to the Princes and Governours of one hundreth, twenty and seven Provinces, from India as far as Æthiopia. The Contents of which Letters were these: H I

5. ad finem. The Kings Letters for the security of the Jews.

Artaxerxes the great King, to the Governours and those that faithfully rule under us, Health. Many men being puffed up with pride, by reason of the many and mighty benefits and honours, which they receive through the too lavish liberality of their benefactours, do not onely exercise their pride towards their inferiours, but also are not afraid to wax insolent against them, who are the authors of their benefits, extinguishing as much as in them lieth, all gratuity that hath ever been amongst men; and being corrupted with unexpected felicity, abuse those graces amongst them, by whom they have gotten the same, in effect no wayes fearing God, whose power they suppose they can deceive. On the other side, other K some enhanced to the administration of the Common-weal, and giving place to the hatred they have conceived against some particular men, deceive their Princes, and by false accusations and detractions, provoke and kindle their wrath against those, who have not done amisse: whence it cometh to passe, that they are sometimes in extream danger to lose their life. The proof whereof appeareth not onely in ancient Histories (the knowledge whereof we have onely obtained by hear-say) but by that likewise which hath been audaciously attempted before our eyes; so that hereafter we ought not to give credit to detractions and accusations, nor to such things as men inforce themselves to perswade: but it behoveth every man to judge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to punish that which is faulty, and to pardon that which requireth pardon, in considering the acts, and not the L words that are spoken. For it is most notorious unto all men, that Aman the Amadathite (an Amalechite by Nation, and by that means a stranger, and not of the Persian blood, but entertained by us) hath in all things enjoyed the fruit of our bounty hitherto; so that he hath been called our father, honoured by all men, and obtained amongst all men, and in all things, the second place of honour after us: yet could he not equally make use of his good hap, neither with prudent advice entertain the greatness of his felicity; but hath sought the means to deprive Mordocheus of his life, who preserved mine; seeking by his fraud and malice to practise the ruin of Esther the companion of our life and Kingdome; and by this means striving to dispossesse me of my most faithful friends, he determined to transfer the Kingdome unto others. Touching my self, in that I know that the Jews, who are by this wretch destinated to die, are no wicked men, but such as live under a well policied government, praying God continually that it would please him to continue the Kingdom in us, and our Successors; I absolve them not onely of that penalty, contained in my former Letters sent by Aman (which by these presents I utterly disanul) but my pleasure likewise is, that they be had in all honour. As for him that practised these things against them, I have caused him and all his race to be hanged before the gates of Susan, according to the just Judgment of God inflicted on them for their offences. My will and pleasure therefore is, That the Copy of this Letter be sent thorow all Countreys of our obeysance, to the intent that the Jews be suffered to live, according to their own Laws, in peace; and that assistance may be given them, to the end M

A they may revenge themſelves of thoſe, who have offered them outrage in their adverſity. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preſervation (when as they were appointed to be ſlain) which day I deſire to fall out fortunate to thoſe that love us, and a monument of revenge on thoſe that pretended our ruine. My pleaſure likewiſe is, that all men, Cities and Nations ſhould know, that whoſoever ſhall neglect, through obſtinacy, to fulfill the tenour of this my Mandate, he ſhall be purſued with fire and ſword: and let theſe Copies be ſet up thorowout all our Dominions, and let each man of the Jews upon the prefixed day, prepare himſelf to be revenged on his enemies.

The year of the world, 3554. before the Nativity of Christ, 410.

As ſoon as the Poſts had received theſe Letters, they preſently mounted on horſeback, and rode each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a royal habit, and
B adorned with a crown of gold on his head, and a chain of gold about his neck, iſſued forth: and the Jews of Suſan, ſeeing him thus honoured by the King, ſuppoſed that his good hap was an aſſurance of their own: and when the Kings Letters were publiſhed, a joy as it were a bright beam of conſolation environed the Hebrew Nation, as well thoſe that were in the City of Suſan, as they that were amid the Countrey; ſo that divers men of other Nations circumciſed themſelves, for fear they had of the Jews, ſuppoſing that in ſo doing they ſhould be in ſecurity. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians Diſtre) the Poſts that carried the Kings Letters certified them, that they ſhould exterminate their enemies on that very day, whereon they themſelves were in danger to be exterminated. The Governours likewiſe of the Provinces, the Lords, Kings,
C and Secretaries, did honour to the Jews: for the fear they had of Mardocheus conſtrained them to moderate themſelves; and after the Kings Letters were publiſhed thorow all the Countrey, it came to paſſe that the Jews ſlew about five hundreth of their enemies. But after the King had declared unto Eſther, the number of the dead that periſhed in the City, ſuſpecting with himſelf what might happen thorow the whole Countrey, and had likewiſe queſtioned with her if ſhe requeſted any further matter, promiſing her that he would ſee it executed: ſhe beſought him that it might be lawful for the Jews to revenge them yet once more the next day upon their enemies, and to hang Amans ten ſons upon the gibbet: which the King (being loth to contradict Eſther) permitted the Jews to do: they therefore returning the 14. day of the moneth Diſtre, ſlew about three hundreth more of their enemies; yet
D aliened they not in any ſort the ſmalleſt portion of their goods. Furthermore, the Jews ſlew in the champain Countrey, and in the Cities, about ſeventy five thouſand of their enemies, whom they diſpatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, and ſolemnized the day following. The Jews that were at Suſan aſſembled themſelves likewiſe on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banqueted the whole day. Whence it cometh to paſſe, that all the Jews which are throughout the world, keep and ſolemnize this day for a feſtival, and ſend Preſents the one unto the other. Mardocheus alſo wrote unto the Jews, who lived under the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to obſerve thoſe dayes, and to ſolemnize them; willing them to charge their Succeſſors to do the like, to the end that this feaſt might continue for ever, and out-live all oblivion. For ſince on that day they ſhould have been made away
E by Aman, they ſhould do well if after they had eſcaped that danger, and taken revenge on their enemies, the very ſame day they ſhould obſerve the ſame to give thanks unto God: For this cauſe the Jews keep a ſolemn feaſt on theſe dayes, and call it Purim, as who ſhould ſay, Lottes. But Mardocheus was great and mighty with the King, adminiſtring the Kingdome with him; he had alſo a part of the greatneſſe of the Queen: and for this cauſe the affairs of the Jews had better ſucceſſe, then was hoped for. See here how matters paſſed, during the Reign of Artaxerxes.

After that John was deceaſed, Jaddus his ſon was made High Prieſt; who had a brother called Manaſſes: Sanaballath ſent by the latter King Darius to govern Samaria (for he alſo was of the race of the Chuteans, from whom iſſued the Samaritans) knowing that Jeruſalem was a famous City, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble unto the Inhabitants of Aſſyria, and Cœloſyria; he willingly marrieth his daughter Nicazo to this Manaſſes, with an intent that this marriage ſhould be as a pledge of his good will to the Nation of the Jews.

What benefits Alexander King of Macedon beſtowed upon the Jews. I

ABout that time, Philip King of Macedon dyed in the City of Ægæas, being traiterouſly ſlain by Pauſanias the ſon of Ceraſtes, of the race of Oreſtes; and his ſon Alexander ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; who paſſing over Helleſpont, gave battel unto the huge army of Darius near the River Granic, and there obtained a famous victory. And hereupon he alſo invading the Countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Ionia, and overrun Caria) finally ſet upon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in another place. But the Elders of Jeruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed, for that Jaddus brother, who was at that time High Prieſt, and had married a forrain woman, ſhould be companion and aſſociate with him in the Prieſthood; ſo as they mutined againſt him. For they ſuppoſed that that marriage K would be but a means to animate thoſe who had a mind to prophane marriages, and prove an inducement to other to communicate in marriage with ſtrangers: remembring them that the cauſe of their evils, and firſt captivity was, becauſe ſome of them had fallen, and offended, by coupling themſelves with women of forrain Nations.

Alexander made King after Philip his father King of Macedon.

They therefore commanded Manaſſes either to forſake his wife, or elſe never more to approach the Altar. The High Prieſt likewiſe being incenſed againſt his brother, as well as the people, drave him in like manner from the ſacrifice. For which cauſe Manaſſes (addreſſing himſelf to his father in law Sanaballath) told him, That although he loved his daughter Nicazo very intirely, yet would he notwithſtanding condeſcend for her ſake to be deprived of the Prieſthood (which was the greateſt dignity that could be among their Nation, and which L had ever continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath anſwered and promiſed him, That he would not onely continue him in the Prieſthood, but alſo would give him the power and dignity of the High Prieſthood, and make him Governour of all places that he commanded, provided the marriage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore aſſured him, That he would build a Temple, reſembling that in Jeruſalem, upon the Mountain of Garazim, which was the higheſt among the reſt, permitting him to do the ſame with Darius conſent. Manaſſes puffed up by theſe promiſes, remained with Sanaballath, and grew in hope that he ſhould obtain the Prieſthood by Darius means: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore divers other, both Prieſts and common people, among the Iſraelites, were intangled in ſuch marriages, there aroſe no ſmall commotion in Jeruſalem. For all they of M this condition retired themſelves to Manaſſes, whom Sanaballath furniſhed with money, and Lands to till, and houſes to inhabit in all ſorts, to favour the intent of his ſon in law.

At the ſame time Darius underſtanding that Alexander, having paſſed the Helleſpont, had overcome thoſe Governours, whom he had eſtabliſhed near unto the flood Granicus, and that he paſſed further, ſpoyling of his Countrey; he gathered together both his horſemen and footmen, reſolving to make head againſt the Macedonians, before they ſhould gain all Aſia: he therefore paſſed Euphrates, and Mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter and fight with his enemies in the Countrey. Sanaballath joyful of Darius deſcent, incontinently told Manaſſes that he would fulfill his promiſes, as ſoon as Darius ſhould return from the conqueſt of

A his enemies. For not onely he, but alſo all the Aſians perſwaded themſelves moſt aſſuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battell againſt the Perſians by reaſon of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Perſian encountering with the Macedonians was overcome, and after he had loſt the greater part of his army, and left his mother, wife and children priſoners, he himſelf fled into Perſia. Alexander arriving in Syria, ſeized Damaſco, took Sidon, and beſieged Tyre: and by his letters ſent unto the high Prieſt of the Jews, he required him to ſend him ſome ſupplies in his warre, aud to ſell his army victuals for their money; aſſuring him that if he deſired the friendſhip of the Macedonians, he would give him that tribute which he paid to Darius, beſides other good turnes. The high Prieſt anſwered Alexanders meſſenger, that he had ſworn unto Darius never to beare arms againſt him, during his life time; againſt which oath of his, he would
B never work any indignitie. Which when Alexander heard, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and reſolved notwithſtanding to continue the ſiege at Tyre, untill ſuch time as it was taken; yet threatned he that as ſoon as he had taken the ſame, he would lead forth his army againſt the high Prieſt, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keep their faith. For which cauſe ſparing no labour, he overcame Tyre, and after he had given order to the eſtate thereof, he came unto Gaza, and took it with Bahemeſes the Captaine of the garriſon that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunitie to make himſelfe great, forſook Darius and followed Alexander, leading with him eight thouſand of his ſubjects: and finding him upon the beginning of the ſiege of Tyre, he offered to ſurrender him all thoſe places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had Darius. Alexander
C accepted him willingly: whereupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole eſtate; giving him to underſtand that Manaſſes (who was brother to Iaddus the high Prieſt of the Jews) was his ſon in law, who with divers of the ſame nation, were deſirous to build them a Temple in the countries under his dominion, aſſuring the King of much profit thereby, becauſe in ſo doing, the force of the Jews ſhould be diſmembred into two parts, and they might not conſpire together to make any new inſurrection or trouble, as in times paſt they had done during the government of the Kings of Aſſyria.

Alexanders victory againſt Darius.

When Sanaballath had permiſſion from Alexander to build his Temple, with the greateſt ſpeed he might, he finiſhed the ſame, and made Manaſſes the high Prieſt thereof, ſuppoſing that it was the greateſt advantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seven D moneths after the ſurprizall of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander alſo razed Gaza, and prepared himſelfe to come ſuddenly upon Jeruſalem. Which when the high Prieſt Iaddus underſtood, he was much grieved, and ſore afraid, not knowing how to grow in favour with the Macedonians: and on the other ſide knowing that the King was diſpleaſed againſt him (becauſe before-time he had diſobeyed him:) He therefore commanded the people to make their prayers unto God, and he in his own perſon offered ſacrifice; requiring God that it would pleaſe him to be a ſhield of defence, and ſuccour to their nation, and to deliver them from thoſe imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whileſt he ſlept, God appeared unto him, and willed him to be of good courage, and commanding him that as ſoon as he had circuited the wall, he ſhould o-
E pen the gates boldly, and command the reſt of the people to attire themſelves in white; and that accompanied with them, he ſhould march forward in thoſe Prieſtly ornaments, which were ordained by the law, to the end that in this equipage they might goe and meet with Alexander, without any apprehenſion of any future evill, becauſe that God had perverted the ſame. As ſoon as he awaked from his ſleep, he was very joyfull, and certified the reſt of this prediction of God; as performing that which had been commanded him, he expected in this manner the approach of the King; and when he knew that he was not farre off from the citie, he marched forth to meet him, accompanied with the Prieſts, and a multitude of other people, preſenting a moſt royall manner of entertain, and farre different from that of other nations; neer unto a place called Sapha, which word ſignifieth a watch (by reaſon that F from that place a man may diſcover the Citie and Temple of Jeruſalem) The Phœnicians and Chaldæans that were of Alexanders train, grounding their hopes upon his diſpleaſure, made their attempt to ſack the citie, and to hew the high Prieſt in pieces: but it fell out quite contrary, For Alexander eſpying the people from a farre in white raiments, and the Prieſts going before them in their fine rochets, and the high Prieſt attired in a robe of purple, brodered with gold, having his Miter on his head, and his plate of gold, wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himſelfe marched forward before the reſt of his company, and fell proſtrate on his face before that Name, ſaluting firſt of all the high Prieſt; and at the ſame inſtant all the Jews together ſaluted the King with one voice, and circled him in round

To whom he anſwered, I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Prieſt worſhippeth: for in my ſleep I ſaw him in ſuch a habit, as I ſee him in at this preſent, at ſuch time as I was in Dio a Citie of Macedonia: and whileſt I conſulted with my ſelfe by what means I might attain to the conqueſt of Aſia, he counſelled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, aſſuring me that it would be he that would guide both me and mine army, and would deliver the Empire of the Perſians into my hands. Since that time I have not ſeen any one attired after the ſame manner: and at this preſent beholding this man, and remembring me of the viſion, and exhortation that he gave me in my ſleep, I hope that mine army being conducted by divine providence, I ſhall overcome Darius, and diſcomfit the H

Alexanders ſacrifice in the Temple, the confirmation of his conqueſt by Daniels prophecy, his bounty to the Jewes.

When he had anſwered Parmenio in this ſort, he gave the high Prieſt his hand, and went with him into the Citie, being conducted by the Prieſts: after this, when he came into the Temple, he offered ſacrifice, according to the high Prieſts direction, whom he honoured likewiſe with very great reverence. And when as likewiſe Iaddus ſhewed him the prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declared that a certain man of the nation of the Greeks, ſhould deſtroy the eſtate of the Perſians, and that in his opinion it ſhould be: thereof Alexander was very joyfull, and diſſimiſſed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day aſſembling the Jews, he commanded them to demand certain favours at his hands: whereupon the high Prieſt anſwered, that he required the exerciſes of the ordinances of their forefathers, & that every ſeventh yeer they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted I them fully. They, beſought him likewiſe, that by his permiſſion the Jews that were in the countries of Babylon and Media, might live according to their laws. And he promiſed them willingly to doe all that which they deſired. He made Proclamation alſo among the people, that if any one of them ſhould beare arms with him (in living according to the cuſtome of their nation) he was ready to receive them with him: and divers took pleaſure to ſerve under him in the warres.

After that Alexander had in this ſort demeaned himſelfe in Jeruſalem, he marched with his armie againſt the neighbouring Citie: and whereſoever he went, he was received with great affection. But the Samaritans, whoſe Metropolitan Citie at that time was Sichem (ſituate neer unto the mountain of Garizim, in which there dwelt divers Jews alſo, that were K revolted from their nation) ſeeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Jews,

For ſuch is the nature of Samaritans (as we have declared heretofore) that when the Jews are in affliction, they deny all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confeſſe the truth:) but when they perceive any beame of good adventure ſhining upon them, ſuddenly they vaunt of their alliance, ſaying, they are neer akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manaſſes the ſonnes of Ioſeph. They came therefore to the Kings preſence, and met him neer unto Ieruſalem, with great magnificence, and demonſtration of ſingular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, Sanaballath had ſent unto the King) beſeeching him that he would viſit their citie, and honour their Temple with his preſence: whereupon he promiſed that at his return he would viſit them. They required him alſo, that he would acquit them of the tribute of the ſeventh yeer, becauſe they did not ſowe in the ſame. He asked them who they were that made that requeſt? They anſwered him, that they were Hebrews: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sydonians. He asked them again, if they were Iews? and they ſaid, they were not. Well (ſaid he) I have made this grant unto the Iews: when as therefore I ſhall return, if I be more particularly informed, I ſhall doe that which ſhall be held requiſit. Thus diſmiſſed he the Sichemites, but he commanded Sanaballaths men of warre to follow him into Egypt; promiſing

After Alexanders death, his Empire was divided amongſt his ſucceſſours, and the Temple builded neer unto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accuſed in Ieruſalem for eating unlawfull meats, or for tranſgreſſing the Sabbath, or for any ſuch like fault, he fled unto the Sichemites, ſaying, that he was accuſed unjuſtly. CHAP. I.

Ptolomey the son of Lagus overcometh and suprizeth both Jerusalem and Judea by a stratagem, and leadeth away divers of the Jews prisoners into Egypt.

F ALexander King of Macedon having overcome the Persians, and established the estate of the Jewes (according as it hath been spoken) he departed this life. Whereupon his dominions and kingdomes fell into divers mens hands; Antigonus was Lord of Asia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering nations: Lysimachus had Hellespont: Cassander Macedon: and Ptolomey the son of Lagus held Egypt. Now when as these men were at discord amongst themselves (whilst each of them affected the soveraignty, and fought the one with the other) divers great and continual wars grew to head, which afflicted many Cities: whereby it came to passe, that many of the inhabitants thereof died in fight, and all Syria likewise under Ptolomey the son of Lagus (who beyond his merit was called Soter, that is as much to say, as a Saviour) lived in little safety He it was that seized Jerusalem by a stratagem & policy; for he entred the city upon a Sabbath day,

day, under pretext to offer sacrifice; and whilest the Jews suspected nothing, but spent the day in idleness and quiet, he surprised the City without resistance, and overpressed the Citizens with hateful captivity. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the Acts of Alexanders successours) witnesseth no lesse, reproaching us of superstition; as if intending thereby, that by that meanes we lost our City. He writeth to this effect. There is a certain nation, which are called Jews, who inhabit a City which is called Jerusalem, both strong and mighty. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomeys hands, because they would not stand upon their guard, and through their importunate superstition, they permitted themselves to be subdued by a Tyrant conquerour. Se here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation. But Ptolemey leading away with him divers prisoners of the better quarters of Judæa, and the places near unto Jerusalem, of Samaria and mount Garazim, sent them into Egypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Jerusalem were most firm in maintaining their oathes and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, he sent Ambassadours unto them: he put divers of them into his garrisons, giving them the same priviledges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had received their oath, that they should be faithfull unto his successours, in memory of the great trust and favours he had bestowed on them, many of the other Jewes likewise of their own accord went into Egypt, partly allured thereunto by the plenty of the countrey, partly by the liberality of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continual seditions betwixt their posterity and the Samaritans: for that they would keep and maintain the customes and ordinances of their forefathers; whereupon divers wars arose amongst them. For they of Jerusalem said that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would that the offerings and sacrifices should be sent thither; the Samaritans contrariwise commanded them to be brought to the mount Garazim.

Jerusalem surprized by policy, and the Jews led away captive.

CHAP. II.

Ptolomey Philadelphus causeth the Laws of the Jews to be translated into the Greek tongue: and dismissing many captive Jews, dedicateth many presents in the Temple of God.

The year of the world, 3680. before Christs Nativity 284.

AFter him Philadelphus succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it for nine and thirty years space, he it was that translated the law into the Greek tongue and delivered the Jewes from that servitude, wherein they were inthralled in Egypt to the number of sixscore thousand, upon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalereus Master of the Kings Library, endeavoured to his uttermost to gather up all sorts of books that were in the world, and bought all that which was agreeable to the Kings intent, who above all things was curious to assemble diversity of books. He being one day demanded by the King, how many thousands of volumes he had already gathered: he answered him, that he had already assembled about some two hundreth thousand volumes; but that shortly he would gather to the number of five hundreth thousand. Besides, he certified him, that he had been lately advertised that there were divers volumes among the Jews, wherein many things as touching their laws and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and deserved to be put in so memorable and famous a Library as his was: which being written and set down in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greek tongue. for their characters seem to have some reference to the Syriack, and their pronunciation likewise not much dissonant from the same; notwithstanding they have their phrase proper and peculiar unto themselves. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated: for the King defraying the charge, might easily cause it to be done, to the end that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his Library. Hereupon the King praising Demetrius care in collecting and gathering Books, wrote unto the High Priest of the Jews, commanding that this translation might be finished. In the mean time a certain man called Aristæus, who was intirely beloved and befriended by the King, by reason of his modesty, and had divers times before that present, resolved with himself to solicite the King, to dismisse all the Jews that were in his kingdome, supposing that at that instant he had fit opportunity offered him to make his request, he spake unto Sosibus the Tarentine, and Andrew the chief Captain of the kings guard, beseeching them to favour him in that which he intended to move the King in. Having therefore sounded the affections of these noble men, he addressed himself unto the King, and spake unto him after this Hecatæus & Rufinus, chap. 2. The Library of Ptolomey Philadelphus.

A this manner: Since, my Soveraign, it behoveth us not to deceive our ſelves by diſſimula-tion, but it neceſſarily importeth us to diſcover the truth: whereas we have concluded with our ſelves, not onely to tranſcribe, but alſo to tranſlate the laws of the Jews, the rather to perform ſome acceptable ſervice to your Grace; what honeſt pretext is there left for us to attain thereunto, as long as there are ſo great a number of Jews kept in thraldome in thy Kingdome? You ſhall therefore do a work anſwerable to the greatneſſe of your courage and benignity, if you deliver them from their miſery, conſidering that he who gave them their law is God, who governeth your Kingdome (as by diligent inquiſition I have certainly apprehended:) for both they and we adore one God Creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Jupiter, for as much as he maintaineth our life and the lives of all men. For that honour therefore which you owe unto God, ſend back theſe people into their countrey, and permit them to inhabit the ſame, who amongſt all men are moſt ſingularly affected to their B religion. Neither hath your grace occaſion to ſuſpect, that I offer theſe ſupplications and prayers unto you in their favour, and for their profit, becauſe I am either allied or deſcended of any of their tribes: But where there is but one God, who is the Maker of all men, and I my ſelf am aſſured, that he taketh pleaſure in thoſe men that addict themſelves to beneſicence, this is the onely cauſe that induceth me to make this requeſt unto you. When Ari-ſteus had ended this diſcourſe of his, the King beholding him with a cheerfull and pleaſant countenance, asked him how many thouſands he thought they were, whoſe liberty he required? Andrew (being hard at hand) anſwered, that there were more then one hundreth and twenty thouſand. Whereupon the King replied, Is this demand, Ariſteus, a matter of C ſmall conſequence, which thou requireſt? Soſibius and the other aſſiſtants anſwered, that his reacknowledgement which he made unto God, who had given him the Kingdome, was worthy the greatneſſe of his courage: ſo that rejoycing at this their content, he charged them at ſuch time as they delivered the men of warre their pay, they ſhould over and above the ſame pay every one of them that had priſoners with them, ſixſcore drachmes: and as touching the requeſt made by them, he promiſed them to diſpatch his letters patents, in moſt ample manner, to bring a happy iſſue to Ariſteus ſuit; or rather to ſatisfie the will of God, which was eſpecially to be reſpected. Whereunto conforming himſelf, he ſent out his Proclamation:
certifying thereby that he not onely ſet them at liberty, who had been brought thither, by his father, or thoſe of his army who attended him: but them alſo who before time had D been in his Kingdome; or that ſithence likewiſe had been brought thither: and notwithſtanding it was told him that the money that would be required for their ranſome, would amount to more then four hundreth talents; yet ceaſed he not to confirm that which he had promiſed. But that it may more plainly appear how great his royall magnificence was, I thought good to inſert in this place the copie of the Edict, which he ſent abroad to this effect: Whoſoever of you that in my fathers ſervice (by bearing arms under him) have made any roades into Syria and Phœnicia, and after the conqueſt of Judæa have taken any priſoners, and brought them into our Cities and Countries, with an intent to ſell them: all they alſo, who have heretofore detained any, or at this preſent have any ſuch captives in E their poſſeſſion, they are to ſet them at liberty that live under their thraldome, receiving for the ranſome of every perſon ſixſcore drachmes; namely, the men of warre, at ſuch time as their wages ſhall be paid them: as for the reſt, they ſhall receive their money out of the Kings treaſurie. For I am of that opinion, that contrary to my fathers mind, and againſt all right, they have been taken priſoners, and that their Countrey hath been in this ſort evilly intreated, by the inſolency of the ſouldiers, who have thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, in transferring them into Egypt. Having therefore an eſpecial re-ſpect of juſtice, and intending to ſhew mercy to thoſe who are wrongfully oppreſſed, I command that all thoſe Jews, who are detained in ſervitude be diſcharged, and that they who hold them captive, receive the ranſome publiſhed by us; ſo as no deceit or fraud be uſed F therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled, our will is, that this Edict of ours be publikely proclaimed three daies after it ſhall come unto your hands, and that thoſe, who hold ſuch priſoners in their poſſeſſion, declare how many priſoners they hold. For we ſuppoſe that in ſo doing, it ſhall redound to our profit. Moreover, it ſhall be lawfull for any man that will, to accuſe the contemners of this decree, and our pleaſure is that ſuch as contradict the ſame, ſhall have their goods confiſcated to the Kings uſes. When this Edict of the Kings publiſhed to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, & that only point was omitted, that concerned thoſe that beforetime had been, & afterwards the ſecond time were led away priſoners, in whoſe behalf he had given no direction; he ſhewed himſelf moſt bountifull in like manner toward theſe: and gave order that the number and tallie ſhould be G ſpeedily gathered, and the money diſtributed to the Committees, and Treaſurers appertaining to him. Which being ſpeedily performed, in the ſpace of ſeven dayes, all the Kings ordinance was accompliſhed, and there was laid out for the ranſomes of them all, to the ſumme of more then four hundreth and ſixty talents: For the Maſters exacted ſixſcore drachmes for the children alſo, grounding themſelves upon the Kings Edict, by which it was ordeined that for every perſon they ſhould have that ſumme, extending the ſame even unto the children.

Theſe things being thus magnificently exployted, according to the Kings command, he gave Demetrius in charge to make a Decree, as touching the traſlation of the books of the H Jews. For the King did nothing raſhly, but adminiſtred all things with great wiſdome, and circumſpection; and for that cauſe the copy of Demetrius ſuggeſtion, and the letters ſent to Demetrius exhortatory Letter to Ptolomey as touching his Library.

Demetrius to the great King, Health. Moſt mighty Prince, ſince you have committed the truſt unto me to find out thoſe books that are deficient in your Library, and to ſearch for ſuch volumes as hitherto have been hid from my ſight, to the end that I might gather them I and perfect them, and that thoſe which are loſt, might be reſtored with all the diligence that thereunto belongeth, after that I had uſed herein all the care that in me was poſſible; I » give you to underſtand, that amongſt others we want the books of the laws of the Jews. For
» in that they are written in Characters and Hebrew words, we have no notice thereof; where-» through they have been more negligently handled then was behoveful: for that untill this » day it hath never hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended ſo far. It therefore be» hoveth thee to have them exactly interpreted; for ſince that thoſe laws proceeded from » God himſelf, it is moſt certain that of all other laws in the world they are the wiſeſt and in» corrupteſt. For which cauſe, Hecataeus the Abderite ſaith, that neither Poets nor Hiſtorians
» have made any mention of them; neither of thoſe who have been policied and governed K » under the ſame: becauſe in themſelves they are pure, and are not to be declared by » impure lips. May it therefore pleaſe your Majeſtie to write unto the High Prieſt of the Jews, » commanding him to ſend you ſix Ancients of every tribe, ſuch as he ſhall know to be moſt » expert in their law, by whom we may clearly apprehend the ſenſe contained in thoſe books,
» to the end that having the faithful interpretation of thoſe things that are contained there-
» in, we may collect and gather them together, to the full ſatisfaction of your Majeſties deſire.

The Kings liberality towards the Jewes.

When the King had in this ſort been both adviſed and ſuggeſted, he wrote unto Eleazar the high Prieſt of the Jews, as touching this matter: giving him likewiſe to underſtand of that liberty by him granted unto the Jews that were in his kingdome: He ſent him alſo fifty talents of gold, to make cups, ewers and veſſels, with an infinite number of precious ſtones, L commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Jewels, to ſuffer the workmen to chooſe what ſtones they liked beſt. Furthermore, he willed that a hundreth talents ſhould be given for the ſacrifices and oblations, and other uſes of the Temple. But after that I have declared what was the Copy of the Letter ſent unto Eleazar the High Prieſt, and the manner how he obtained that Sacerdotal dignity; I will ſet down both the rich preſents, and their curious Workmanſhip.

After the deatth of Onias the High Prieſt, his ſonne Simon ſirnamed the Juſt, ſucceeded him in his place, who for that cauſe was ſo called, by reaſon of the piety which he ſhewed toward God, and good affection which he bare unto his Countriemen. This Simon dying and leaving behind him one onely ſonne, of young and tender yeers, who was called Onias:
his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we ſpeak at this preſent) took upon him the M Prieſthood, and to him wrote Ptolomy in ſuch manner as is hereafter expreſſed. King Ptolo- mey to the High Prieſt Eleazar, health. VVhereas divers Jews dwelt in my Kingdome, whom my father had honoured (though during the reign of the Perſians they were drawn thither as priſoners) ſome of whom he hath eſtabliſhed to be Chieftains in warre, under honourable wages and conditions: To other ſome born in his time in Egypt, he hath committed his Forts and garriſons, to the end they might be reſpected among the Egyptians: After that I have been called to the Government, I have behaved my ſelf graciouſly towards all men, and eſpecially towards thoſe of your nation, of whom I have delivered more then one hun-

A "dreth thouſand out of captivity, diſburſing their ranſome out of mine own coffers: I have "likewiſe inrolled ſome of thoſe that were of age in the companies & bands of my men of "war: I have received ſome into my Court, whom I took to be faithful and loyal, and in my "opinion well-worthy of ſuch preferment: ſuppoſing that the moſt acceptable and the "deareſt preſent I might offer up unto God, for his providence extended towards me in ad- "vancing me to the kingdome, was to perform the ſame. And being deſirous not only to "gratifie them, but alſo al thoſe Jews that are in the whole world, I have determined to cauſe "your law to be tranſlated; that after it hath been tranſcripted out of Hebrew into Greek, "I might place it in my Library. You ſhall therefore do well, if you chuſe me out ſix diſ- "creet and learned men of every Tribe amongſt you, who are already ſtept in years, and B "ſend them unto me, who by reaſon of their age ſhall be well inſtructed in your laws, and "ſufficiently enabled to expound the ſame. For in ſo doing, I ſhall accept it at your hands, "as a great honour. For this cauſe I ſend unto you Andrew the principal Captain of my "guard, and Ariſtæus alſo (whom we eſpecially honour) to confer with you: by whom I "have ſent you one hundreth talents of ſilver, as the firſt fruits of thoſe gifts and ſacrifices, "which we intend to offer in the Temple. You ſhall do us an eſpecial favour, if you ſignifie "your minde unto us by your Letters.

The year of the world, 3684. before Chriſts Nativity, 280.

As ſoon as Eleazar had received the Kings Letters, he returned him an anſwer ful of honor and affection, according to the tenour which enſueth: "The high Prieſt Eleazar to King Pto- "lomey, health. If you, your Queen Arſinoe, and your children be in health, all our affairs like- C "wiſe have no leſs fortunate ſucceſs. We have received your princely letters with no ſmall "joy, and have both read and conſidered upon the contents thereof; we have alſo publiſhed "them in the preſence of all the people, and have declared unto them your pietie towards "God, and have ſhewed them thoſe viols which you ſent us, twentie of gold, and thirtie of "ſilver; with five veſſels, and a Table which in way of preſent you have ſent unto us. We "have likewiſe ſhewed them thoſe hundreth talents which Andrew and Ariſtæus (very ver- "tuous and excellent learned men, and honoured by you amongſt your deareſt freinds) have "brought unto us, to be employed in ſacrifices & other neceſſities of the the Temple. Know "therfore that whatſoever ſtandeth either with your content or profit, we will enforce our "own natures, to the end we may acknowledge the benefits, which you have divers wayes D "beſtowed upon our nation. We have therefore duely and continually offered ſacrifice "for you, your Queen Arſinoe, your children and friends: the people likewiſe have prayed "that God would ſend you happy ſucceſſe in whatſoever you deſire, that your kingdome "may be continued in peace, and that the tranſlation of our law may be accompliſhed in "ſuch ſort, as you deſire, for your own commodity. To that intent we have choſen ſix El- "ders out of every Tribe, whom we ſend unto you, together with the original of our Law. "Our requeſt is, that according to your accuſtomed piety & juſtice, you return us both our "laws and theſe Interpreters in ſafety, as ſoon as they have ſatisfied your expectation. Fare "you well.

Eleazars Letters in anſwer to Ptolomey.

This is the anſwer which the high Prieſt ſent unto him. Yet have I thought it to be a mat- ter meerly unneceſſary to ſet down the names of the ſeventy two Elders in particular, who were ſent by Eleazar together with the law, notwithſtanding they were ſet down in the Epi- ſtle. Yet think I it not amiſſe, to recite the excellency and faſhion of thoſe preſents that were ſent by the King, and offered up unto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards the ſervice of God. For in performance thereof, he ſpared no im- meaſurable expence, but continually aſſiſted the workmen, and examined their workman- ſhip, to the end that nothing might be careleſly finiſhed, or negligently performed. I will therefore ſet down (as near as in me lieth) the excellency of every piece (although it may be thought that the courſe of hiſtory requireth it not) but therefore will I diſcourſe the ſame, becauſe my deſire is by ſo doing to expreſſe unto the Readers, how great the liberality and F generoſitie of the King hath been. And firſt of all I will begin to deſcribe the Table.

The deſcription of thoſe preſents which Ptolomey dedicated in the Temple of Jeruſalem.

The golden Table.

The King deſirous to make it great in all dimenſions, deſired to know the greatneſſe of that which was at Jeruſalem, to the intent that he might cauſe it to be farre greater. And having certain notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, he ſaid that he would have it five times greater then the other: but that he fea- red leſt being ſo great, it would be unfit to offer ſacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the oblations which he offered, ſhould not onely ſerve for ſhew, but that they might alſo be ſomewhat proper for the uſe and ſervice of the Temple. For this cauſe, concluding that the firſt was of ſufficient and convenable meaſure, he reſolved his ſhould not exceed the other in greatneſſe; but that equalling the ſame in quantitie of gold, it might exceed the other in variety and beauty of workmanſhip. For he was ingenious to obſerve the nature of divers things, and to invent new and unexpected fashions: so that by his ripe judgment, he G shewed the workmen such inventions, as beforetime had not been in use; and commanded them to make and finish them, having alwayes an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to work by. He undertook therefore to make the Table of two cubits and a half in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a half in height all of massie gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large; enriched with moving waves, on which there was a bend graven with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being tri-angularie, everie angle presented the same engraving; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no wayes different figure, represented it self: within the inside of this border it was inchased with divers goodly figures, but on the outside it was far more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eye. For this cause the upper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, & of three angles, which H (as we said) were apparent at such time as the Table was turned, each one seeming of equal magnitude with the other. Upon the graven bends there were precious stones inchased, distant by equal proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tied by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselves to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the manner of an oval; and there was a border of golden twigs engraven round about the Table: under the ovals there was a crown garnished with clusters of divers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung down, the spikes of corn stood upright, and all was inclosed with pomegranats, and the precious stones were inchased in gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to present each sort of fruit in their native colours. There was also a rank of ovals under the crown, not unlike to the former, made of I gold: so that on both sides, both the varietie and delicacie of the work appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the Table, in which there appeared not any difference, on whatsoever side it was turned; and from the top unto the lower foot one and the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some four fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the feet of the same were staied, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and clasps of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better be seen, and that on what side soever it were turned, it might alwayes seem the same. They engraved also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were divers kinds of precious stones, shining like stars: and amongst the rest there were Rubies and Emeralds of most orient brightness, as also all other sorts of K stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beautie or price. Near unto this labyrinth from the one end unto the other, there were certain corded plates in the middle like unto a Rhombus or Losenge, upon which there were certain pieces of Crystal and Amber, enchased and placed the one by the other in equal distance, and proportion: which gave a marvellous contentment to whomsoever beheld the same; The Chapters of the feet were made after the form of a Lily; the leaves whereof bent themselves under the Table, whereas otherwaies the stalke seemed to be stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands breadth large, adorned with a Carbuncle in every part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feet was staied; and on every one of them was L there engraven by curious workmanship, Ivie and Vine branches loaden with clusters of grapes, so made to life, that they seemed to be very grapes indeed For the whole was so sub-tile and delicate, that when the wind blew, the workmanship waved and was carried up on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather natural, then counterfeited by art. The work was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seams and joynts might not any wayes be seen:

The thickness of the Table was no less then half a cubit.

See here what this present was, which through intire affection the King presented: wherein the price of the stuff, the diversitie and beautie of the workmanship, and the excellency M of the engraving was accomplished in perfection. Moreover in this he so far exceeded himself to perform so much, that if it might not surpass the other which was already in the Temple, at leastwise in art, new invention and excellency of project, it might be far more excellent and admirable. He gave besides this, two vessels of gold, scaled from the bottom as far as the half part of the Cup; and besides that, inriched with divers precious stones
Two golden standing cups. curiously and diversly enchased. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubit high, made of all sorts of precious stones, and at the foot thereof were ingraven spires, after the manner of twigs, and fast by them a certain fold like unto a net made in oval fashion, that ascended even unto the brims. The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatness of four fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies,

A lillies, ivy flowers, and vines with their clusters of grapes engraven round, about. This was the beautie and excellency of those two Cups, each of them containing twentie and foure pints. There were also others made of silver, so transparent, as if they had been of the purest Crystal, thorow which all things that were put into them, were naturall and manifestly discovered. He caused also thirty ewers to be made, in which all the gold that was not covered with precious stones, was shadowed with Ivie leaves, and vine branches most curiously engraven: and all these things were not only miraculously wrought by the wonderfull cunning of the workmen; but were in like sort seconded by an ambitious diligence of the King, who thinking it not enough that without parsimony he had undertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his most serious affaires) visite the shops, and examine the works; and that which more and more increased their diligence, was, for that they saw him so intent upon
B the businesse, which made them the more earnest upon their work.

The yeer of the world, 3684. before Christs nativity, 280.

Two silver standing cups. Thirty vials. Ptolomees charge and diligence in the finishing of his presents.

And these were the presents which were sent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem. All which being consecrated and laid up in the Temple by the high Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and delivered into their hands certain presents to be tendered in his behalf unto the King, he dismissed and sent them back again. No sooner were they arrived in Alexandria, but the King (having notice thereof, and how the seventy two Elders were come with them) he sent to seek out his Embassadours, Andrew and Aristæus, who came and presented him with letters from the high Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face. And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jerusalem to expound
C and interpret the Law, he contrary to his ordinary custome and manner dismissed all those that resorted thither for their particular affairs, to whom he was accustomed to give audience every fifth day; as it was his ordinary manner also to give monethly satisfaction to forrain Embassadours. Having therefore for that time dismissed them, he kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent unto him; who coming to his presence (accompanied with those presents which the high Priest had delivered them to present unto him, with the Originall wherein the Law was written with golden letters) he asked them where their books were: and they discovering and opening them, shewed them unto him. After the King had seen them, he was very much astonished, to see the membranes and parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole form thereof so perfectly conjoyned, that it was impossible to discover the seams: and
D he told them that he gave them thanks, for that they were come unto him, and more great thanks unto him, that he had sent them, and the greatest and most speciall thanks unto God, who was the Author of these lawes. Whereupon the Elders and those that assisted them, cried out altogether, and wished that all good hap might befall the king: who through the excessive joy that he conceived, burst out into tears: For naturally extreem joy and most grievous sadnes have like effects. After he had commanded that these books should be committed to their trust, who were deputed to that office, at length he saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behoovefull for him first of all to debate with them upon the matter, to which intent he had sent for them; and afterwards to give them entertainment: In a word,
E he confessed unto them, that their access was so gratefull unto him, that he promised them, so long time as he lived, he would every yeer renew and honour the memory of the same, (and by good hap it was the very same day wherein he overcame Antigonus by Sea.) His pleasure was also, that they should be his guests, and he caused divers goodly lodgings to be assigned them under the Castle.

The 70 Interpreters coming to Alexandria, are royally entertained.

Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertain strangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily imployed in the same) to prepare for every one of them such things, as were necessary for their diet and entertainment. For so was it ordained by the King, that in every Citie that had any particularity in their manner of life, there should be a Commissary appointed to provide for forriners that arrived in that place, to the intent they might be intreated according to their customes: intending thereby, that their entertainment should be F the more agreeable unto them, and that they might be the less tired with forrain novelties. This custome of his was put in practice at this time by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his own person disposed all that which was necessary for that hospitalitie. He prepared two places to banquet in, in two severall parts (according as the King had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him, and the rest might be placed neer unto his Table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kind of enterview. When they were in this sort placed, the King commanded Dorotheus to entertain them in like manner, as he was wont to do those, who repaired unto his Court from Judæa. Hereupon, he dismissed the Egyptian Priest, and others that were wont to make the ordinary prayers: which done, he commanded that one of the Elders called Eleſeus (who G in like ſort was a Prieſt) to bleſs the Table: whereupon he ſtanding upright in the midſt of them all, beſought God to bleſs both the King and his Subjects with all happineſs. Whereupon there aroſe an applauſe and acclamation of all men, intermixed with joyfull delight; which being ceaſed, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheer with that which was ſet before them. When the King had held his peace ſo long as he thought convenient, he began at laſt to play the Philoſopher, asking of every one of them certain queſtions in Phyſick, praying them to decide and diſcuſs the ſame: and when as each of them in order had very pertinently anſwered to the queſtion that was propounded unto them, the King took great pleaſure therein, and for twelve dayes ſpace he continued this feaſt. Whoſo deſireth to know the queſtions that were propoſed unto them in particular, let him reade the book H which Ariſteus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was not onely aſtoniſhed at their anſwers, but the Philoſopher Menedemus alſo, who having affirmed that all things were adminiſtred by divine providence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this diſcourſe was, this queſtioning debate was finiſhed. But the King proteſted in their preſence, that their acceſs had infinitely contented and inſtructed him, in that by their means he had obtained the good hap to be informed by them how to govern his Kingdom. Whereupon he commanded that each of them ſhould have three talents given him, and that they might be conveyed to their lodgings. Some foure dayes after, Demetrius took them with him; and led them over that trench of the Sea, that containeth ſeven furlongs, and that bridge which covereth the Iland with the continent, and toward the Northermoſt end I thereof, he aſſigned them a lodging remote from all noiſe, and fit for contemplation: to which place after he had brought them, he beſought them, that ſince they had all thoſe things that were neceſſary for the interpretation of their laws, they would intend the ſame without any diſcontinuance of the work, untill they had brought it to perfection; and they for their parts imployed all their labour and diligence that was in them poſſible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning untill three houres after noon: after which time they imployed the reſt of the day in their refection; and to that end they were furniſhed in all aboundance with all ſorts of victuals. Over and beſides, Dorotheus preſented them with a part of divers diſhes, which were prepared for the King: for ſo had his Majeſty commanded it. Thus every morning K entred they the kings Palace, and after they had ſaluted him, they retired themſelves to their accuſtomed place; and after they had waſhed their hands in the ſea water, and were purified, they ſet them down in that manner to proceed and proſecute their tranſlation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the work was fully finiſhed in the ſpace of ſeventie and two dayes: Demetrius aſſembled all the Jews in that place where the law had been tranſlated, and cauſed it to be read over in the preſence of the interpreters themſelves. Which done, the Aſſembly approved the Expoſition of the Interpreters; and prayſed Demetrius, by whoſe ſuggeſtions, and invention they enjoyed ſo great a good. They requeſted likewiſe that this Expoſition ſhould be peruſed and over-read by the Nobles and Governours. After L this, both the Prieſt, the Elders of the Interpreters, and the Magiſtrates of the people required, that ſince this tranſlation was ſo happily atchieved, it might remain unaltered; ſo that no jot thereof might be changed.

The banquet that Ptolomey made for the Jewes; and their prayers before meat.

The Tranſlation of the Bible into the Greek tongue.

Which reſolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceived any thing in that Tranſlation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he ſhould conſider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing herein very diſcreetly, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, ſhould continue inviolable for ever. The King therefore was highly contented, ſeeing his endeavours and purpoſe in that behalfe ſo happily and profitably finiſhed: but above all things, he tooke pleaſure in reading of the Law, admiring at the deep conceit and wiſedome of the Law-maker, and began to queſtion with Demetrius, by what means it came to paſs, that neither any Poet, M nor Hiſtoriographer had made mention of that Law, notwithſtanding, that in it ſelf it was ſo admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this anſwer: that no man was ſo hardy to touch that work, by reaſon that it was Divine, and every way venerable: aſſuring him alſo, that certain men who had attempted to ſet their hands thereto, had been puniſhed by God: giving him to underſtand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce certain contents of that Law into his Hiſtory, had been diſtraught in mind for more then thirty dayes, and that having ſome intermiſſion of his fit, he appeaſed God by prayer; thereby eaſily conjecturing what was the cauſe of his malady. Moreover, he was certified by a Viſion that appeared unto him in his ſleep, that this inconvenience befell him, in that he had too curiouſly ſearched into God's juſtice upon thoſe Ethnicks that intermedled with the ſacred Scriptures.

A into ſacred and divine matters, and had intended to communicate the ſame with prophane men: from which enterpriſe ſith he had deſiſted, he recovered his right wits again. He likewiſe inſinuated further, that Theodeſtes the tragick Poet, intending to make mention in ſome of his Poems of a certain hiſtorie written in the ſacred Scriptures, was ſtrooken blinde; and acknowledging the cauſe hereof to proceed from his audacious preſumption, he was reſtored his ſight after he had appeaſed Gods diſpleaſure. The year of the world, 3684. before Chriſts nativity, 380.

When the King had conſidered on theſe words, according as Demetrius had diſcourſed them unto him, he proſtrated himſelf on the earth, and commanded that the books ſhould be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integrity. Furthermore, he exhorted the Tranſlators to repair oftentimes unto him from Judea, aſſuring them that in ſo doing, the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for
B that time he thought good to diſmiſſe them: but when they ſhould return unto him again of their own motion, they ſhould obtain all that which their wiſedome deſerved, or his magnificence might impart unto them. This ſaid, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three ſeverall ſutes of apparell, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certain bed or curious ſeat to ſit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themſelves. But to Eleazar the high Prieſt he ſent by them ten couches, whoſe feet were of ſilver, and the furniture correſpondent, and a veſſell of thirty talents. Ten purple robes likewiſe, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine linen: and beſides that, he ſent in way of preſent unto the Temple, Ewers, Baſons, and two golden veſſels: beſeeching
C Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his ſubjects had a will to come unto him, he would permit him, aſſuring him that he would highly eſteem the converſation of ſo learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleaſure in ſuch affairs. See here how Ptolomey Philadelph eſteemed and honoured the Jews.

The preſents which the King beſtowed upon the Interpreters, and thoſe he ſent to Eleazar.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Aſia honoured the nation of the Iews, and gave them liberty and freedome to dwell in thoſe Cities that were builded by them.

D THey received honour likewiſe at the hands of the Kings of Aſia, becauſe they had born arms under them. For Seleucus ſurnamed Nicanor, highly reſpected them, and permitted them to dwell in thoſe Cities, which he built in Aſia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewiſe, which was the Metropolitane and chief Citie. Moreover he ordained, that they ſhould be held in as great eſtimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein: ſo that even unto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Jews refuſing to anoint themſelves with forrain oyl, do receive a certain ſumme of money from the maſters of the exerciſes in lieu of the oyl. Which when the people of Antioch intended to aboliſh, during the preſent warre, Mutianus at that time Governour of Syria, oppoſed himſelf againſt them. Again, when as Veſpaſian and his ſonne Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priviledges that the Jews enjoyed might continue no more; yet could they not obtain the ſame. Whereby the humanitie and valour of the Romans may appear, and in eſpeciall of Veſpaſian and Titus, that notwithſtanding they had been ſo travelled by the warres of the Jews, and were ſo bitterly incenſed againſt them, for that they had not by laying down their arms ſubmitted themſelves, but had continued warre againſt them to the uttermoſt; yet deprived they them not of their fore-ſaid priviledges, but ſurmounted their diſpleaſure, which they had long before conceived againſt them: and in like ſort had not regard to the requeſt of two ſo puiſſant cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were:
F In ſuch ſort as they granted nothing in favour of them, neither ordained any thing in diſfavour of thoſe whom they had overcome in warre, to the intent to aboliſh one onely jot of thoſe priviledges which they had in times paſt; but ſaid that they that had reſiſted them by arms, and who had been overcome, were ſufficiently puniſhed for their obſtinacy: and as touching thoſe that had not committed any offence, they ſaw no reaſon to deprive them of their rights and prerogatives. We know likewiſe, that Marcus Agryppa was of the ſame opinion, as touching the Jews. For whereas the Ionians were ſeditiouſly bent againſt them, and beſought Agryppa that it might be onely lawfull for them to make uſe of the priviledge, which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greeks intituled by the name of God) had given them; requiring that if the Jews were of their bloud, they might be tied to adore the ſame gods which the Ionians worſhipped: When as therefore this matter was referred to the determination determination of the Judges, the Jews had the day, and obtained the libertie to live according to their own laws and cuſtomes: and he that at this time pleaded their cauſe, was Nicholas Damaſcene. For Agrippa pronounced, that it was unlawfull for them to innovate any wayes: And if any man deſire to have exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twenty three, and twenty fourth book of the hiſtories of Nicholas. Neither ought this judgement of Agrippaes to ſeem in any ſort ſtrange: for at that time our Nation had not by any warres procured the Romans diſpleaſure. But upon juſt occaſion may a man admire the magnanimitie of Veſpaſian and of his ſonne Titus, who behaved themſelves with ſuch moderation after ſo great a warre, and ſo grievous battels, as they had fought againſt us. G

The year of the world, 3684. before Chriſts Nativity, 280.

Now will I return to my purpoſe, from whence I have digreſſed. At ſuch time as Antiochus the great reigned in Aſia, the countrey of Jewry was grievouſly ſpoiled, and both the Jews and the inhabitants of Cœloſyria endured many miſeries. For Antiochus making war againſt Ptolomey Philopator and his ſonne, called Ptolomey the Famous, they were pitifully perplexed. For whether Antiochus either overcame or was overcome, they were continually ſpoiled: ſo that betwixt the proſperitie and adverſitie of Antiochus, they fared like a ſhip toſſed and tormented with a ſtorm. Finally, after Antiochus had overcome Ptolomey, he conquered Jewry. After the death of Philopater, his ſonne ſent a great army into Cœloſyria under the conduct of Scopas, who ſeized a great number of thoſe cities; and our Nation alſo was inforced by warre, and conquered by him. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, neer unto the flood Jordan, and obtained the victory, diſcomfiting the greater part of the enemies armie; at which time Antiochus recovered again thoſe cities of Cœloſyria, which were before-time ſurpriſed by Scopas. He took Samaria alſo: which when the Jews perceived, they ſubmitted themſelves of their own accord unto him, and having entertained him in the citie of Jeruſalem, they gave both his Army and his Elephants abundance of proviſion, and willingly aſſiſted him with their forces, to ſubdue thoſe garriſons which Scopas had planted in the fortreſſes of the higher city. For which cauſe Antiochus ſuppoſing it to be a matter behovefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardneſſe which the Jews had expreſſed in his ſervice, wrote unto his Captains and friends, ſignifying unto them how forward the Jews had been in his warres: and to expreſſe likewiſe what gifts he intended to beſtow upon them. Antiochus the great, King of Aſia & Syria, vexeth the Jews.

Hereafter I will inſert the copie of his letters, which he wrote in favour of them, after I have recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane, writeth, anſwerable to this purpoſe, which I will recite out of the ſixteenth book of his hiſtories. Scopas (ſaith he) the Generall of Ptolomeys army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter overcome the whole nation of the Iews. He reciteth alſo in the ſame book, that after that Scopas had been overcome, Antiochus ſeized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and anon after the Iews, which dwelt at Ieruſalem where the Temple was, joyned themſelves with him: and although we are to ſpeak more amply and particularly of that apparition that happened neer unto the Temple; yet notwithſtanding we will deferre the recitall hereof untill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to return unto our purpoſe: I will recite in this place the copy of thoſe letters which were ſent by the King. King Antiochus to Ptolomey, Health. Antiochus Epiſtle to Ptolomey, ſas touching the libertie of the Jews.

„ Whereas the Iews have given us a moſt apparent teſtimony of their affection towards us, „ ſince the firſt time of our entrance into their countrey, and have magnificently entertained „ us at ſuch time as we were in perſon before their Citie, by preſenting themſelves before us „ with all their Elders; and have alſo furniſhed us largely with all that which was neceſſarie for „ our ſouldiers and our Elephants; and have likewiſe taken arms with us againſt the Ægyptian „ garriſon: we have thought it a matter anſwerable to our honour, to affoord them ſome ſatiſ- „ faction in repairing their Citie, ruinated by humane caſualties, to the intent it might be in- „ habited and peopled again, by gathering together thoſe Iews that are ſcattered abroad in „ divers places, and planting them again in the ſame. And in eſpeciall (to the end that the „ ſervice of God may be renued) we have ſet down a certain ſumme of money to be imployed M „ in ſacrifices, and in buying beaſts for their offerings, wine, oyl, and incenſe; that is to ſay, „ twenty thouſand ſicles of ſilver; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one „ thouſand, four hundred and ſixtie meaſures of wheat, and three hundred, ſeventy and five „ meaſures of ſalt. We likewiſe command, that the work „ of the Temple be finiſhed with the galleries, and other neceſſarie buildings; and that all the „ ſtuffe of timber be brought out of Iudea and other places, and eſpecially out of Libanus, „ without any tax or tillage: which exemption alſo ſhall take effect in all other neceſſaries, „ that are requiſite towards the reparation of ſo famous a Temple. Hitherto we have ſufficiently declared, what friendſhip Antiochus the great bare unto the Iews. This Onias was of no great capacity, and withall was very covetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty talents of ſilver, which his predeceſſours were wont to pay to the Kings of Egypt, of that tribute which the people paid unto him. Whereupon Ptolomey Euergetes, the father of Philopator, was grievouſly incenſed againſt him; ſo as he ſent an Embaſſadour to Ieruſalem to accuſe him, for that he failed to pay his accuſtomed tribute, threatning him, that if henceforward he received it not, he would divide his countrey amongſt his ſouldiers, and ſend them

Joſeph the ſonne of Tobias preventeth the imminent calamity of the Jews, and becometh Ptolomies friend.

The taxation of the high Prieſt for offending the King.

BUt a certain man called Joſeph, the ſonne of Tobias and of Onias ſiſter who was the high Prieſt; being young in yeers (but honoured in Ieruſalem for his wiſedome, fore-ſight, and juſtice) having certain notice by his mother of the arrival H of this Embaſſadour, came unto the City (for he had been abſent in the village of Phicala where he was born) and ſharply reproved Onias his Uncle on the mothers ſide for that he did not any waies, provide for the ſecurity of his Citizens, but ſought to draw his countrey-men into a generall hazard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was levied for the tribute: Whereby he told him that he had obtained the government over the people, and purchaſed the High Prieſthood. And that if he were ſo bewitched with money, that for the love of the ſame he could have the patience to ſee his countrey in hazard, and behold his citizens alſo ſuffer all that which cruelty could inflict upon them; he counſelled him to repair unto the King, and to require him to beſtow the whole or the half of the tribute upon him. Hereunto Onias anſwered, that he would no more I execute the government, and that if it were poſſible for him, he was ready to give over the Prieſthood, and that therefore he would not repair unto the King, becauſe he was not any waies mooved with theſe occurrences. Whereupon Joſeph asked him, if he would permit him in the peoples behalf to go Embaſſadour unto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias anſwered that he gave him free leave. Upon this occaſion Joſeph went up into the Temple, and ſummoned the people to a generall aſſembly, exhorting them to be no wayes troubled, and to conceive no fear through the negligence of his uncle Onias, requeſting them to be confident in heart, and eſtranged from all ſiniſter ſuſpition; promiſing them that he himſelf would go in Embaſſage unto the King, and faithfully plead their cauſe before him, and perſwade him that they had committed no inſolent neglect, or contempt againſt his Majeſty. Which when the K people underſtood, they gave Joſeph hearty thanks. Whereupon he preſently came down from the Temple, and honourably entertained the Embaſſadours that came from Ptolomey, and having preſented them with gifts of great price, and feaſted them magnificently for many dayes, he ſent them back to their Prince; aſſuring them that he would in perſon follow them. And the rather was he incited to this journey, becauſe the Embaſſadour had perſwaded him to repair into Egypt, under ſuch aſſurance, that he would obtain all his requeſts at Ptolomeys hands; the rather for that he was wonne with the young mans free ſpirit and noble entertainment.

Aſſoon as the Embaſſadour returned into Egypt, he certified the King of Onias ingratitude, and Joſephs humanity: certifying him that he would come in perſon to entreat pardon L for the people, for that offence they had committed againſt him; and the rather, for that he was in eſpecial authority among the people: and ſo farre uſurped he upon Ioſephs praiſes that both the King and the Queen Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithſtanding he was as yet abſent. But Ioſeph ſent unto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Having therefore furniſhed himſelf with apparel, veſſels, and horſes, with the expence of almoſt twenty thouſand drachmes, he arrived in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and governours of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the King was accuſtomed every yeer to ſell them to the men of moſt reſpect in every City: Theſe meeting with Ioſeph on the way, began to mock at his baſeneſſe and poverty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence M that the King was at Memphis, he ſet forward and went out to meet him. When as therefore the King, accompanied with the Queen and Athenion his friend, who had diſcharged the place of Embaſſadour in Jeruſalem, came riding onward in his chariot; Athenion (who had been honourably entertained by Ioſeph) perceiving him upon the way, certified the King, that it was he, of whom he had ſpoken upon his return from Jeruſalem: proteſting on his behalf that he was both a good and honourable young man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him above the reſt, and made him mount his chariot. Where he was no ſooner ſeated, but the King began to accuſe Onias for that which he had committed. But Ioſeph ſaid unto him, Pardon him, O King, and have reſpect to his old yeers. For you know that

A ordinarily old men and young children have one and the ſame underſtanding; but for our ſelves, who are young you ſhall have what you pleaſe to require, without any pretext or cauſe of diſcontent. Hereupon the King took pleaſure in the good behaviour and pleaſant diſcourſe of the young man, and began to love him the more, as if he had received a preſent atteſtation of his wiſdome: whereupon he commanded that he ſhould be lodged in his own Palace, and that daily he ſhould accompany him at his Princely table. The year of the world 3770. before Chriſts Nativity, 234.

As ſoon as the king came back to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria ſeeing Joſeph ſitting near unto the King, were ſore diſpleaſed: and the day drawing near wherein they were to receive the aſſurance of their tribute, they that were of the greateſt reckoning in their countrey farmed the ſame; ſo that the tributes of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thouſand talents. Whereupon Joſeph ariſing, blamed the far-
B mers, for that th ey had plotted amongſt themſelves to beat down the price of the tributes, promiſing to give the double; and that he would likewiſe return the forfeitures that were levied upon the goods of ſuch as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gave ear to this diſcourſe of his with great content, and ſaid, that he approved the ſale of theſe tributes unto Joſeph, who in this ſort augmented his revenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could give ſureties? he made him anſwer with a bold courage: O King (ſaid he) I will give thee ſuch pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and ſuch as you cannot miſtruſt. When as therefore the King inſtanced him to produce them: I will (ſaid he) O King, preſent thee for ſureties, thy ſelf, and the Queen thy wife, that one
C of you may be a ſurety for me to the other. Ptolomey ſmiling hereat, granted him the farm of the tribute, without further ſurety. This favour of his diſpleaſed thoſe Governours of the Cities that were come into Egypt, in that they ſaw themſelves contemned and conſtrained to return with ſhame unto their houſes. But Joſeph obtained 2000. footmen from the King; to the end to enforce the tribute from thoſe Cities, who were negligent in their payments: and after he had borrowed five hundreth talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria.

The tributes of Caloſyria committed to Joſeph.

As ſoon as he came to Aſcalon, he demanded the payment of the tribute at the citizens hands, which they not onely refuſed to perform, but moreover upbraided him with injurious words. For which cauſe laying hold on about ſome twenty of the Principals among them, he
D put them to death: and having gathered their ſubſtances together, he ſent the King ſome thouſand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomy admiring at his wiſdome, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to diſpoſe of all things at his pleaſure. The Syrians underſtanding hereof, were ſore abaſhed; and perceiving that the Aſcalonites were ſlain by Joſeph, through the ſeverity of his juſtice and their diſobedience, they opened him the gates, and received him willingly, and paid him their tributes. Whereas alſo the Scythopolitanes in way of contumacie refuſed to lay down, according to order, their accuſtomed tributes, he ſlew the chiefeſt amongſt them: the confiſcation of whoſe goods he ſent unto the King. When as therefore he had gathered much ſilver, and made great gains
E of the purchaſe of the tributes, to the intent to eſtabliſh and make his power of more continuance, he liberally employed his gettings; conſidering with himſelf, that it was a part of wiſdome to keep and entertain his good hap, by thoſe riches which he himſelf had gotten: For he ſent many preſents both to the King and Queen, and beſtowed liberal bounty both on their familiars and favourites, and alſo on all thoſe which had any authority, credit or favour in the Court, to winne and bind them unto him by his benevolence. And in this felicity of his continued he the term of twenty two years; during which time he was the father of ſeven children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, whom he begot on the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he married upon this occaſion which enſueth.

The Aſcalonites and Scythopolitanes puniſhed for their contempt.

Joſephs wealth and children.

F Walking upon a time in Alexandria in the company of his Brother (who led with him his daughter already marriageable, to the intent to beſtow her upon ſome Jew of good quality) whileſt he ſate at meat with the King, there entered into the banquet a certain fair damoſel, trained up in dancing, with whom growing enamoured, he told his brother thereof, praying him ſith by the lawes of their countrey it was forbidden that a Jew might marry with a ſtranger, that he would hide his fault, and be a faithfull aſſiſtant unto him, to the end that he might enjoy her whom his heart deſired. His brother promiſed him to ſhew his willing forwardneſſe herein; and in the mean time he adorned and decked his own daughter, and brought her by night unto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who ſhe was, by reaſon he had drunk overmuch) and had her company. Which coming to paſſe divers times, he was as yet farre more burningly inflamed with the love of this Dancer, and told his brother that he was in danger to be enamoured all his life time; and that notwithstanding the King would not grant her unto him. His brother told him that he ought not to vex himself, promising him that he should enjoy her whom he loved, and that already she was his wife; opening unto him how all things had hapned, and how he had rather wrong his own daughter then to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Joseph had praised the kind and naturall affection of his brother towards him, he took his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath been said. Who being thirteen years old, gave testimony of that naturall spirit, and dexterity that was in him; by reason whereof his brethren conceived a certain hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled them in all things, and had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate him. Whereas therefore Joseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest judgment, and understanding; he sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned back unto him rude, and illiterated, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, he sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desart place distant from the high way some seven dayes journey, and gave him with him three hundreth couple of oxen, to sowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

Hircanus offspring and towardnesse.

When as therefore he came unto the place, and perceived that the yokes were missing, he asked advice of some of the husbandmen: who counselled him to send some one back unto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would be spent in sending back a messenger, devised a cunning expedient stratagem, more then might be expected from one of his years. For he caused ten couple of oxen to be slain, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the skinnes, and fashion couples thereof, and having yoked his oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home unto him. VVho loved him the more intirely, by reason of his wisdome, and the subtilty of his understanding; praising besides that his resolution and execution, esteeming him the more, for that he was his onely true sonne; to the general discontent of the rest.

Joseph sendeth his sonne Hircanus to Ptolomey.

VVhen as therefore news was brought unto Joseph, that about that time King Ptolomey was blessed with a young sonne, and how all the chiefest Lords of Syria, and the Countries under his obeysance, repaired to Alexandria in great pomp to celebrate the birth day of the Kings sonne; he being of himself unable (by reason of his age) to repair thither, he sounded his children, whether any one of them would go and visit the King. When as therefore the eldest sonnes had excused themselves, and made refusal to undertake the journey, pretending that they were of insufficient ability to perform the message, and all of them gave counsel that their brother Hircanus might be sent: Joseph took great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would go to King Ptolomey: who promised to undertake the journey, and told his father that he needed no great summe of money to perform the voyage; because in the way he would travel frugally, and content himself for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Joseph was very glad to hear of his sonnes prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for a while, he counselled his father, that he should not present the King with any thing out of Judea, but that he should write unto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliver such summes of money as he thought convenient to buy that which he found to be most magnificent and of best esteem in that City. Joseph imagining with himself, that perhaps he would onely imploy some ten talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsell, wrote unto his factor Arion (who had the use of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering up his money in Syria, he was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the Kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to defray the same. Having therefore letters of credence unto him, he journeyed towards Alexandria. VVhereupon his brethren wrote presently unto all the Kings friends, that by some means they would make him away.

Treason intended against Hircanus.

As soon as he was arrived in Alexandria, and had delivered his fathers letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would have? hoping that he would crave but ten, or some little overplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth and reproved him for his prodigality, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with much travell, and thrifty sparing; and refusing his demands, he prayed him to imitate his fathers example who begot him: and in a word he told him, that he would deliver him no more then ten talents; and that for no other use, then to buy gifts to present the King withall. VVhereupon Hircanus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra, praying her that she would moderate the young man (for

A (for Arion was in great eſtimation with the Queen, who for this cauſe acquainted the King with the matter.) Whereupon Ptolomey ſent for Hircanus, and ſaid unto him; that he marvelled, that being ſent unto him by his father, he had not as yet viſited him; and beſides that, he had committed his fathers Agent to priſon: he therefore commanded him to yield him a reaſon thereof. Whereunto he anſwered, that there was a law among the Jews, that no man ſhould taſte of the ſacrifices that had not firſt of all viſited the Temple, and ſacrificed unto God; and that in that reſpect he had not hitherto viſited his Majeſtie, becauſe he expected certain preſents to preſent his Highneſs with from his father, who was his bounden ſervant. Furthermore, he alledged, that he puniſhed his fathers ſervant, becauſe he had diſobeyed his commandement, which he ought not to do, whether his maſter were either noble or ignoble: and if (ſaid he) we chaſtiſe not ſuch men, as they have deſerved, expect (O King)
B that you alſo ſhall be neglected by your ſubject.

Hircanus apologie of his action.

When Ptolomey heard theſe words, he began to ſmile and wonder at the magnanimitie of the young man. Arion perceiving that the King held himſelf ſatisfied, and that he was like to have no aſſiſtance at his hands, delivered Hircanus the thouſand talents, and by this means was he ſet at libertie. Some three dayes after, Hircanus came and ſaluted both the King and Queen; who entertained him graciouſly, and feaſted him kindly, for the affection ſake which they bare unto his father. He privily enquiring among the Merchants, bought one hundred young lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age, paying a talent for every one; and the like number of Virgins for ſo many talents. Being therefore invited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, becauſe that (by C reaſon of his young yeers) they that aſſigned the places, according to every mans dignitie, made ſmall account of him. Now when as all the gueſts, after they had eaten their meats, laid all their bones before Hircanus, ſo that the table was loaden round about him, a certain pleaſant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whoſe merrie conceits and jeſts the King very willingly liſtned unto) during the time he was at meat, being ſollicited by thoſe that were at the table, came unto the King, and ſaid unto him:

See here, my Liege, what ſtore of bones are before Hircanus; hereby you may conjecture, that his father hath fleeced all Syria, as he hath bared theſe bones of fleſh. The King laughing at Triphons words, asked Hircanus how he came by ſo many bones before him? Not without great cauſe (ſaid he) O King; for doggs devoure the fleſh with the bones, as theſe do (in which ſpeech
D he glanced at thoſe who ſate with him at the table, becauſe they had no bones before them:) but men eat the fleſh, and caſt the bones away, as I do, becauſe I am a man. The King wondering at his diſcreet anſwer, commanded all the reſt to applaud him in approbation of his wittie urbanitie.

Hircanus jeſts.

The next day he ſought out all the Kings friends, and the principals in Court, and ſaluted them one by one, enquiring of their ſervants, what preſents they would court the King with upon the birth of his ſon? Who told him that ſome of them would give twelve Talents, and other ſome that were in dignitie, would preſent them according to their abilitie. Whereupon Hircanus made a ſhew of diſcontent, in that he wanted power to offer ſuch a preſent, pretending that he had no more but five Talents. All which theſe ſervants preſently
E reported to their Maſters: who were very joyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceived that Joſeph ſhould be blamed, and would offend the King through the abjectneſs of his preſent. Now when the day of the ſolemnity was come, and they likewiſe that pretended to preſent the King moſt magnificently, offered no more then twenty Talents: Hircanus preſented the hundred young Lads he had bought to the King, and the Virgins unto Cleopatra: for whom he had paid a Talent by the powl. At this unexpected magnificence of his gift, all men were amazed: but beſides this, he gave gifts of divers Talents to the King and Queens favourites and ſervants, and their attendants; whereby he warranted himſelf from the danger that might fall unto him by their means. For the brothers of Hircanus had written unto them to murther him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this
F young man, and willed him to ask whatſoever gift he beſt liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would pleaſe the king to recommend him by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the king had ſingularly honoured him, and had given him many bountifull rewards, he wrote unto his father and brethren, and all his Governours, and Commiſſaries, and in that ſort ſent him away. His brothers hearing news how he had in all things highly contented the King, and that he returned with great glory, they iſſued out to meet with him, with an intent to murther him, with their fathers knowledge. For he being diſpleaſed with him, by reaſon of his above named large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yet concealed he his diſcontent for feare of the King.

But when his brothers came and encountred him on the way, he slew divers of those that accompanied them, and two of his brethren also were left slain upon the place, and the rest fled unto Jerusalem unto their father. And when as upon his repair unto Jerusalem, he perceived that no man entertained him, he was afraid, and departed presently from thence to the other side of Jordan, where he past his life in receiving and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus sirnamed Soter, the son of Antiochus the great, reigned in Asia. At that time also died Joseph, Hircanus father, who was a man of good conceit and great courage; who established the people of the Jews in their entire peace, and hath released them from povertie and many disasters, and had held the tributes of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria, for the space of twenty two yeers. His uncle Onias died also about the same time; leaving the Priesthood to his son Simon; after whose death, his son Onias was made high Priest: to whom Arius King of Lacedemon sent an Embassage and letters, the copy whereof hereafter ensueth. The letter of the King of Lacedemon to the high Priest of the Jews. 1 Mac. 12.

ARius King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We have found out a certain writing wherein it is recorded, that the Jews and Lacedemonians are of the same race, and both of them descended from Abraham. It is therefore requisite, that since you are our brethren, that you give us to understand wherein we may pleasure you. The like will we do also, and will repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours, shall in communitie be yours. Demoteles our messenger bringeth you our letters folded in square, the seal whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. These were the Contents of the Lacedemonians letters: After the death of Joseph it came to pass, that the people began to mutine in the quarrell of his children. For the elder brethren made warre against Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the people were divided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the high Priest Simon also, by reason of his affinitie with them, followed their partie. Whereupon Hircanus resolved to repair no more unto Jerusalem, but fixing his habitation on the other side of Jordan, he made continuall warre against the Arabians, slaying a great number of them, and taking many prisoners. He builded an huge Tower of white marble from the bottome to the top, and on the same planted he the figures of many living creatures in sculpture of great height. About the same he drew and forced a deep trench of flowing water; and having hewed the front of the rock that stood opposite against his building, he made divers caves therein, many furlongs long. He also made divers chambers therein, both to eat, sleep, and dwell in. He drew thither likewise currents of springing water, in so great abundance, that it gave much delight to those that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of every Cave was so little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made so narrow, becaus they might the better serve for his security and refuge; that if so be he were at any time assailed by his brethren, he might avoid the danger of surprisall. Moreover, he builded many huge halls, which he adorned with great and goodly Gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him Tyre, and is scituate between Arabia and Judæa, on the other side of Jordan, not farre from the Countrey of Essebonitis. He commanded in this Countrey some seven yeers, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whose death, his brother Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdome. Ptolomey also King of Egypt (who was likewise called Epiphanes) died, and left two children very young behind him, of whom the eldest was called Philometor, and the younger Phiscon. When as therefore Hircanus perceived Antiochus grew mighty and strong, and feared to be punished by him for his executions done against the Arabians, he slew himself with his own hands, and Antiochus enjoyed all his goods. A mutinie of the rich Jews against the other.

Jesus created high Priest by Antiochus Epiphanes.

Jesus deprived of the Priesthood.

ONias the high Priest being dead about this time, Antiochus gave the Priesthood to Jesus his brother. For that sonne unto whom Onias had left the succession, was as yet very young (of whom we will speak in convenient time and place.) This Jesus (Onias brother) was deprived of the Priesthood, through the Kings displeasure conceived

A conceived against him, who gave it shortly after to his younger brother called Onias: For Simon had three sons, who, as we have declared, successively possessed the Priesthood: this Jesus caused himself to be called Jason, as his other brother caused himself to be called Menelaus, whereas his name was Onias. But Jesus, who had first of all been established in the place of the high Priest, arose against Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were divided into factions, and Tobias sons were on Menelaus side: but the greater number of the people followed Jason: so that Menelaus and the sons of Tobias being grievously vexed by them, retired themselves to Antiochus, giving him to understand, that it was their intent to forsake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the Kings, and to live after the manner of the Greeks; exhorting him to give them licence to erect a place of Exercises in Jerusalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them,
B they so demeaned themselves, that there appeared no more sign of Circumcision in them; so that at such time as they were naked, there was no difference between them and the Greeks, and neglecting all the ordinances and customes of every countrey, they conformed themselves to the behaviour and manners of other nations. Antiochus having all things in his kingdom, according to his hearts desire, resolved to make war in Egypt: desiring to be possessed of the same, both for that he contemned Ptolomey's sons age (who were as yet weak) as also for that they were not as yet capable to manage their so mighty estates. Arriving therefore near to Pelusium with a great power, he circumvented by a subtil policy the young Ptolomey Philometor, and subdued Egypt: for after he had besieged Memphis and taken the
C same, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to besiege the City, and to lay hold of the King who was therein. But he was driven, not only from Alexandria, but also out of all Egypt, by the summons that was sent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and dislodg his army out of that countrey, as we have heretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly discourse the acts and gests of this King, who overcame Judea, and spoiled the Temple: for having only made a brief mention of him in my former works, I think it necessary in this place to make a more exact recital of his History.

CHAP. VII.

Antiochus leadeth out his army against Jerusalem, taketh the City, and spoileth the Temple.

AFter that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the fear of the Romans had forsaken that countrey, he led his army against Jerusalem, and encamped before the City, and surprised it by surrender, in that the gates of the City were set open unto him by those of his faction: all which hapned in the hun-
E dreth fourty and third year of the reign begun by Seleucus. Now when he saw himself Lord and master of Jerusalem, he slew divers of the contrary faction; and after he had gathered together many great and rich spoils, he returned back to Antioch. This misfortune happened some two years after the surprisal of the City, in the hundreth, fourty and five year of the reign of that family, on the five and twentieth day of that moneth which we call Chasleu, and the Macedons Apellæus, the Romans December, in the hundreth fifty and three Olympiade; at which time he neither spared them who gave him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, and effected him the means to spoil the inestimable riches of the Temple, with greater freedom: but being no less tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, he spared neither. For having seen what quantity of gold was in the Temple, and how huge a number of presents and precious ornaments were in the same, he F was so overcome with covetousnes, that he brake and violated all conventions and conditions. After therefore he had spoiled the Temple, and carried away the vessels dedicated unto God, the golden candlestick, the golden altar, the table of the shew-bread, the censers, and pulled down the curtains made of fine linen and scarlet; after he had emptied the treasures that were hidden, and left nothing behinde him of any value, he drowned all the Jews in grievous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbad them to offer their usual and daily sacrifice unto God, according to the prescript order of the law: and after he had spoiled the whole City, he slew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the rest of them into captivity, with their wives and children, to the number of ten thousand. Furthermore, he burned the faireſt buildings of the City, and razed the wals, and raised a fortress in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high citadal, commanding the rest. For this cause, having inclosed it with high wals and towers, he planted a garrison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scum of the wicked Apostate Jews, who were given over to all impieties, and who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischievous injuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the Temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and ordinance of the Jews. He constrained them likewise to forsake their devotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he reverenced for gods, building in every City and Borough both Temples and Altars, on which he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbad them likewise to circumcise their children, threatning to punish him whosoever he were, that was found to do the contrary. Moreover, he chose certain overseers that should constrain them to fulfil his commandement; so that a great number of Jews, some of their own accord, othersome for fear of threatned punishment, endeavoured themselves to satisfie the Kings decree. But those men who were of upright hearts, and valiant minds, little respected these menaces: For having more respect to their laws and customs, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced, if they performed not the edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruel punishment, for many dayes, amidst the which they yielded up the ghost. For after they were whipt and maimed in their bodies, they were crucified and tortured alive: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the necks of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred Scripture, they defaced and burnt it, and they with whom it was found, were put to a most cruel death.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Jews, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, and called their Temple of Garazim no more the Temple of God, but (as we have heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt and unconstant natures, and challenged their descent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent Embassadours to Antiochus with letters to this effect, To King Antiochus the mighty God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem." Our Ancestors enforced by the continual pe- "stilence that reigned in their countrey, and induced by a certain ancient superstition, have "been accustomed to observe that day as a festival, which the Jews call their Sabbath; and "having built on the mount of Garazim a Temple, and dedicated it unto a god, who hath "no name, hath offered up in the same divers and solemn sacrifices. But since that you have "inflicted punishment on the Jews, according as their wickedness deserveth, the commissa- "ries of the King, supposing that we were tied to their customs (by reason of some alliance "between us) couple us with them, and charge us with the same accusations: whereas we are "born Sidonians, as appeareth by the rols of our common-weal. We therefore beseech you, "who are our benefactor and Saviour, to command your governour Apollonius, and your "steward Nicanor, not to molest us any more, by charging us with those accusations which "appertain unto the Jews: who neither are tied unto vs by alliance, neither accord with us in "manners: but that our temple, which hath not hitherto born the name or title of any God, "may now be called the temple of Jupiter of Greece: by which means we shall be delivered "from all trouble, and being at liberty to attend our affairs, we may the easier and more wil- "lingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritans the King answered, sending them back their own letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor, health." The Sidonians of Sichem "have sent us this suggestion; which we annex unto these our letters. Since therefore they, "who were sent unto us to this intent, have sufficiently approved both to us & our councel "of friends that they are utterly stangers unto those crimes, wherewith the Jews are charged, "and are desirous to live according to the laws of the Græcians, we absolve them in as much "as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of "Jupiter of Greece: we have written to the like effect also to Apollonius our Magistrate. Antiochus forbiddeth the Jews to use their laws: only Matthias the son of Asmonaeus contradicteth him, and obtaineth the victory against Antiochus Captains.

AT that same time there dwelt a certain man in Modin (a village of Jury) whose name was Matthias, who was the son of John, and who was the son of Simon, the son of Asmonaus a Priest of the rank of Fourth, born in Jerusalem. This Matthias had

A had five ſons, John called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Judas called Macchabeus, Eleazar named Auran, and Jonathan called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained unto his ſons, as touching the miſerable eſtate of their Common-weal, the ſack of their City, the ſacriledge of their Temple, and the miſeries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the Law, then to live in ignominy. When as therefore the Commiſſaries deputed by the King, came unto the Borough of Modim, to conſtrain the Jewes to perform that which was enjoyned them, and to command them to ſacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who ſurpaſſed the reſt in honour, and other qualities, but in eſpecial in excellency of deſcent and nobility) to begin firſt of all to offer ſacrifice, to the end that the reſt might follow him and be induced by his example; promiſing him that in ſo doing, the King would honour him greatly: Matthias anſwered thereunto, That
B he would in no ſort commit that idolatry, aſſuring them, that notwithſtanding all other Nations of the world, either in reſpect of love, or for fear of juſtice ſhould obey the Edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he nor any of his children could or would be induced to forſake their fathers Religion. Now as ſoon as he had returned this anſwer, and held his peace, a certain Jew ſtepped forth to offer ſacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in ſuch ſort diſpleaſed, that both he and his ſons fell upon him, and with their ſwords hewed him in pieces. He ſlew Apelles the Kings Captain likewiſe, with certain other ſouldiers who would have withſtood him. And not content herewith, he overthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice; If (ſaid he) any one be affectioned to the Lawes of his fathers, and the ſervice of God, let him follow me: and this ſaid, he ſuddenly retired him-
C ſelf into the deſart with his ſons, leaving the Borough utterly diſpoſſeſſed. The reſt doing the like, retired themſelves into the deſart, with their wives and children, and made their habitation in certain caves. The Kings Captains having intelligence hereof, gathered thoſe forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, and purſued the Jews into the deſart. And having overtaken them, they laboured firſt of all, to make them ſubmit themſelves, and to make choyce of that which ſtood with their profit, rather then to indanger themſelves, and inforce them to chaſtiſe their diſobedience, with blood in war. But the Jews reſpected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands, who had already concluded and reſolved among themſelves, rather to dye then commit ſuch an impiety: For which cauſe they (who omitted no opportunity) aſſailed the Jewes on a Sabbath day, and D burned them within their caves, who neither reſiſted their enemies, nor ſo much as cloſed up the mouthes of their caves: And therefore abſtained they from all defence by reaſon of the day, reſolving with themſelves, in no ſort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to ceaſe from all labour on that day). There were therefore about ſome thouſand ſtifled in their caves; accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithſtanding, divers eſcaped, who joyned themſelves with Matthias, whom they appointed likewiſe for their Captain; who declared unto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day, aſſuring them that if they did it not, but ſcrupulouſly obſerved the Law, they themſelves ſhould be enemies unto themſelves, if perhaps the enemy ſhould aſſail them that day, and ſhould not ſtand upon their guard: for by that means they ſhould be deſtroyed with-
E out reſiſtance. By theſe words he perſwaded them to do as he had ſaid: and untill this day it is a cuſtome among us, that if need require, we make no difficulty to fight on the Sabbath day. Matthias therefore having aſſembled a ſufficient number of men about him, deſtroyed the Altars, and ſlew thoſe that had forſaken their Religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For divers were ſcattered here and there among the Nations, for the fear they had; theſe commanded he to circumciſe their children that were not circumciſed; driving thoſe from every place, whom Antiochus had ordained to ſee his Law executed.

After therefore Matthias had governed for the ſpace of one year, he fell ſick of a moſt deſperate diſeaſe; for which cauſe he called for his ſons, and ſpake unto them after this man-
F ner: My ſons, I muſt now walk the way that is deſtinated unto all men: I therefore recommend and exhort you to follow my deliberation, and diligently to obſerve the ſame, remembring you of the intent of me your father, who have begot and nouriſhed you, which is, to maintain the Laws of our countrey, and to eſtabliſh our eſtate, which is upon the point to be overthrown, except you ſubmit unto thoſe who either voluntarily or forcibly betray the ſame: ſhew your ſelves therefore to be worthy ſons of me who am your father; ſtrengthen your hearts with courage to overcome all force and neceſſity; thinking with your ſelves, that if God ſee that you be ſuch, he will not forſake you, but taking pleaſure in your vertue, he will once more grant you the favour to recover your former peace and liberty, and will

There were a great number of them alſo who were wounded, and much booty was taken in the enemies Camp: after which execution inriched with ſpoils, he retired himſelf. Lysias and Gorgias led their Armies into Jewry, and are overthrown.

WHen King Antiochus heard these tydings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, and hiring divers strangers and mercenary Islanders, he prepared himself to invade Judæa about the Spring time. But after the muster of his Army, when he truly found that his treasure failed him, and that he was in great scarcity of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his own nature a man of great and magB nificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolved first of all to go into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affaires with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as governed all the Countrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giving him likewise a part of his Army and some of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to see his son Antiochus well and carefully trained up, untill his return: commanding him expresly, that when he had conquered Judæa, he should make the Inhabitants thereof his slaves, and sell them to those that would give most, and destroy Jerusalem, and utterly abolish that race. The King having given this charge to Lysias, led forth his Army towards the Countrey of Persia, in the hundred fourty and seventh year: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marC ched onward toward the Governours of the higher Countrey.

Antiochus committing his Kingdome, Provinces and son to Lysias charge departeth into Persia.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the son of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authority amongst the Kings friends) and gave them 40000 footmen, and 7000 horsemen, to invade Jewry. Who marching as far as the City of Emaus, encamped in the plain field, and strengthened their army with divers allies out of Syria, and of the countreys thereabouts, and with divers Jews also, who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Gives with them, to manacle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

The year of the world, 3800. before Christs Nativity, 164.

When Judas had viewed the camp, and numbred the enemy, he encouraged the Souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to inD vocate and call upon him, according to their Law, and that clothing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed manner in such extream dangers, and call upon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so doing, God would have compassion on them, and give them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battel, according to the ancient custome of his Countrey by thousands and hundreths, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for fear lest such men being too niggard of their lives, or distracted by such affections, should not fight couragiously; he stood up in the midst of them, inciting his Souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words: My Countreymen and companions, never have we hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we E ought to expresse our courages, and contemn our dangers, then at this present. For at this " time, if you fight couragiously, you may recover your liberty: which of it self is so accept- "" able unto you all, that being of it self most desired, ought the rather more earnestly to be " affected, because by it onely you shall win the means to serve God. As therefore you shall " be disposed at this time, you may obtain the same, and withall enjoy a happy life (which " consisteth in living according to our Lawes, and ancient customes) if you behave your selves " valiantly: but if you prove cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremity " of infamy, and hope no lesse then the utter extermination of all your race. Think therefore " with your selves, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your " selves, that in fighting for your liberty, for your lawes, and for piety, you shall obtain im- " F mortal glory: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you " may bid your enemies battel. Thus spake Judas to his Army, to encourage them. "

Whilest thus he was intent about the future battel, certain tydings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and five thousand footmen, to the end that under the conduct of some fugitives, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set upon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to break into the enemies Army, especially for that he knew that their forces were divided. But early in the morning, Judas accompanied with three thouſand men (who were ſlenderly armed by reaſon of their poverty) ſhewed himſelf unto his enemies, who were at Emaus; and after he had ſurveyed and ſeen their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how ſouldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithſtanding they ſhould be naked: for although they were in that eſtate, yet God (who took pleaſure in the greatneſſe of their courage) had already given them the victory againſt a number of armed ſouldiers: and ſuddenly he commanded the trumpets to ſound, ſo that ruſhing in upon his enemies on the ſudden, he diſmayed them, and diſcomforted their hearts. And after he had ſlain divers H

Notwithſtanding, Judas would not permit his ſouldiers as yet to take the benefit of the ſpoile, becauſe they were as yet to fight againſt Gorgias and his Army, aſſuring them, that as ſoon as they had valiantly executed the ſame, it ſhould be lawful for them to make their bootie, without fear, becauſe they ſhould have no further enemies, either to fear or expect.

Whileſt he ſpake in this ſort unto his ſouldiers, they that were with Gorgias, diſcovering from the top of a certain hill, perceived that the army that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their camp was on fire: for although they were far off, yet did the ſmoak I

Judas having knowledge thereof, came forth againſt him, accompanied with ten thouſand men; and diſcovering the number of his enemies far to exceed his (after he had beſought God by prayer that it would pleaſe him to fight with him) he charged the vantguard of the enemy with ſo great force, that he diſcomfited them, and ſlew about ſome five thouſand of them, leaving the reſt in great fear. Lyſias knowing the reſolution of the Jews, and how they were preſt to die, except they might live in libertie; on the other ſide redoubting their deſperations, more then their forces, he gathered together the reſt of his army, and returned obtained ſo many victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to aſcend up unto Jeruſalem, and to purifie the Temple that was deſolated; and to offer thoſe ſacrifices ordained by the Law. Aſcending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple deſart, and the gates thereof burned, and graſſe growing within the ſame, through deſolation. Being therefore confuſed with ſo pitious a ſpectacle, he began to weep with all thoſe that accompanied him: And having choſen out certain of his beſt ſouldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garriſon that were in the fortreſſe; whiles he himſelf purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly and reſolutely fulfilled, he ſent for new veſſels, a candleſtick, a table, an altar of incenſe, all made of gold. He put alſo veils or hangings to the doors, accuſtomed to be ſpread abroad; and ſet gates to the Temple. And having M thrown down the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all ſorts of ſtones, neither hewen, nor hammered, according to art. The five and twentieth day of the moneth of Chaſleu (with us September) there were lights ſet upon the candleſticks, and perfumes laid upon the altar, and loaves impoſed upon the Table, and ſacrifices offered upon the new altar. After that Iudas had reeſtabliſhed the ſervice of the Temple, both he and his countrey-men ſolemnized a feaſt for eight daies, omitting not any kind of honeſt pleaſure, banquetting them ſumptuouſly and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Pſalmes. Thus rejoyced they at this reeſtabliſhment, ſeeing that contrary to all hope after ſo long time, they had recovered the cuſtomes of their countrey, and their ancient Religion: ſo that a decree was made for thoſe that ſhould come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the ſpace of eight dayes the rebuilding of the Temple ſhould be ſolemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: and ever ſince that time untill this day we celebrate this feaſt called the feaſt of Lights, for this cauſe in my opinion, for that this ſo great felicity began to ſhine unto us as a light, contrary to all hope. He incloſed the City likewiſe with a wall and builded high towers thereon, in which he planted garriſons againſt the incurſions of the enemies. He fortified the city of Bethſura alſo, that it might ſerve as a fort againſt the enemy. The feſtival ſolemnized for the reeſtabliſhment of the Temple.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed thus, the nations round about diſpleaſed with the reeſtabliſhment and force of the Jews, oppreſſed divers, whom they ſurpriſed by ambuſhes and treachery. On thoſe Iudas made continuall warre, to hinder their incurſions, and to make them partakers of thoſe evills they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he ſlew the Idumæans that were deſcended from Eſau, and brought away a great prey out of their countrey, and ſhut up the ſonnes of Baan their Prince, who lay in wait for the Jews; and having beſieged them, he overcame them, ſetting fire on their towers; and killing all the men that were therein. After this he departed from thence, and made war upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mightie army, under the conduct of Timotheus. Theſe did he encounter with and overcome, and took their City of Iazor, and burned it, and led away their wives and children into captivity, and afterwards returned into Iudæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, aſſembled themſelves together in Galaad againſt the Iews, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who having retired themſelves to the fort of Dathema, ſent letters unto Iudas, giving him to underſtand, that Timotheus intended to ſurprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requeſted him to deliver them from this danger. And whileſt he was reading of theſe letters, certain meſſengers came unto him out of Galilee, giving him to underſtand that they were aſſaulted by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, and other people thereabouts. Iudas fighteth with the Ammonites, Simon againſt the Tyrians, and others, whom he diſcomfiteth.

IUDAS bethinking himſelf of that which beſt concerned him in theſe two urgent and inſtant occaſions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thouſand choſen men with him, and to go and ſuccour thoſe Jews that were aſſailed in Galilee: and himſelf accompanied with Jonathan his other brother, and eight thouſand fighting men, repaired unto the countrey of Galaad; leaving the government of the reſt of the forces in the hands of Joſeph the ſon of Zachary, and with Azarias, commanding them to have a careful and diligent eye to Judæa, and not to enter battel with any one, until his return. Simon arriving in Galilee, fought againſt his enemies, and diſcomfited them; and afterwards purſuing them that fled as far as the gates of Ptolemais, he ſlew about three thouſand: and after he had gathered the ſpoils of ſuch as were ſlain, he ſet many Jews at liberty, who were priſoners; and having reſtored them their goods, retired himſelf back again to his countrey. But Iudas Machabeus, and Jonathan his brother having paſt Jordan, and marched on the otherſide thereof for the ſpace of three dayes, encountred with the Nabathæans, who peaceably came out to meet them; by whom he underſtood the eſtate of thoſe that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extreme penury incloſed and beſieged in Caſtles and Cities of the countrey by their enemy. Who likewiſe beſought him to make haſte and encounter the ſtrangers, and to ſeek the means to ſave their countrey-men. therein, who were able to bear armes. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he marched towards another Caſtle where the Iews were incloſed, and ſhut up by Timothy and his army; and attaining the ſame about the mornings brie, he ſurpriſed the enemy at ſuch time as they were raiſing their ladders to ſcale the walls, and addreſſed their engins for battery: whereupon he cauſed the trumpet to be ſounded, and after he had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinſmen and friends being in great danger, and had diſtributed his forces into three battalions, he ſet upon the enemies rereward. Timotheus ſouldiers perceiving that it was Machabæus, whoſe valour and good hap they had already approved to their great loſſe, they without delay took themſelves to flight. But Iudas with his army followed after them and ſlew about eight thouſand of them and marching toward Malla (a citie of the enemies) he ſurpriſed the ſame, and and ſlew all the men therein, and afterwards conſumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and deſtroyed Chaſpoma, Boſor, and divers other places in Galaad. G H

Anon after Timothie levied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his ſuccour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his paſſed he the flood, and encamped neer unto a town called Rapha; exhorting his ſouldiers to behave themſelves like valiant men againſt their enemies the Jews, and to hinder their paſſage over the ſtream: foretelling them, that if they ſhould win the paſſage, both he and his were aſſured of the worſt. Iudas underſtanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him all his forces, and marched haſtily againſt the enemy, ſo that having paſſed the river, he ſet upon them, killing divers of them that reſiſted, and grievouſly affrighting the reſt, who caſting away their arms, were conſtrained to flie. There were ſome of them, who ſaved themſelves by ſwiftneſs of foot: and ſome alſo, who retired themſelves into a temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be ſecured and ſo to eſcape: but after that Iudas had taken in the City where the temple was, he ſlew them, and burnt the ſame, enforcing his enemies to ſuffer divers and dreadful ſorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their wives and children, and ſubſtance, and brought them with him unto Judæa. When as therfore he drew near unto the town of Ephron, which was ſcituate directly in his way, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to march any other ways or return home, except they levelled their way (which they refuſed to do) he ſent Embaſſadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free paſſage thorow their City. For they had made Barricadoes of ſtones to cut off the paſſage. When as therefore the Ephronites would give no ear unto him, he beſieged their city for a day and a nights ſpace, and took and burned the ſame, and ſlew all the men that were therein; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and ſo great a number was there of thoſe that were ſlain, that he marched upon the bodies of dead men. The Iews are brought out of the countrey of Galaad into Iudea. Ephron beſieged & burnt.

After they had paſt Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethſan (by the Greeks called Scythopolis) confronted their eyes; from whence they departed and came into Iudæa with joy and gladneſs, ſinging and praiſing God, and uſing their accuſtomed paſtimes and ſongs of victory. This done, he offered up ſacrifices of thankſgiving for their happy ſucceſs, and the ſafety of his army; for that in all thoſe battels and encounters he had not loſt one Iew. L

In the mean while two Captains, to wit, Joſeph the ſon of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garriſon of Iudæa (whil'ſt Simon went into the countrey of Galilee againſt thoſe of Ptolemais, and Judas and Jonathan his brother were in Galaad againſt the Ammonites) deſirous alſo for their part to obtain the honour and reputation of valiant men of war by ſome notable exploit, took their forces, and went towards Iamnia. Againſt theſe iſſued out Gorgias, who was Governour in that place, and charged them in ſuch ſort, as the Iews loſt ſome two thouſand men, and fled as far as the marches of Iudæa. This miſchief fell upon them, becauſe they had diſobeyed Judas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For beſides many other projects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foreſaw that if they ſhould attempt any thing contrary to his command, they ſhould have but bad ſucceſs therein. Judas and his brethren making war againſt the Idumæans, gave them no reſpit, but continually charging them on every ſide: they took alſo the City of Chebron, and deſtroyed all the fortifications in the ſame, and burnt the towers, ſpoiling all the countrey of the enemies, and razed the City of Mariſſa likewiſe. Afterwards coming to Azot, they took and ſpoiled it, and carried away a great quantity of booty from thence, and returned back into Iudæa in ſafety, joyful of their victory. M

The death of Antiochus Epiphanes in Persia.

The yeer of the world, 3801. before Christs Nativity, 163.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 13. 1 Mac. 6.

AT that time Antiochus travelling along the higher countries of his Kingdome, understood that there was a very wealthy city in Persia called Elymais, in which there was a rich Temple of Diana, repleniſhed with all ſorts of preſents: wherein alſo he was enformed, that Alexanders arms and curets, who was Philip King of Macedons ſonne, were reſerved there of long time. Upon theſe conſiderations he was incited to repaire unto Elymais, which he beſieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his ſiege, but ſuſtained the ſame valiantly, he failed of his purpoſe. For they drave him from their City, and ſallying out upon him, they purſued him ſo hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and loſt a great number of his men. Whileſt thus he was diſcomfited, for that he had been fruſtrated of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to war againſt the Jews, and how they of Jewry were now the ſtronger, and had the upper hand. This trouble ſeconding his former diſcontent, he was ſurprized with deſpaire, and fell ſick; which ſickneſſe aggravated with other accidents, increaſed in ſuch ſort, that he knew well he ſhould die: and for that cauſe he called for his moſt familiar friends, and certified them, that his ſickneſſe was violent and deſperate, and that he was ſeized with ſuch affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Jews, and deſtroyed their Temple, committed horrible ſacriledge, and contemned the reverence of God: and whileſt thus he ſpake unto them, he gave up the ghoſt. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwaies praiſe-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would have ſpoiled the temple of Diana in the countrey of Perſia. For ſith he had onely intended to commit ſacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to ſuffer puniſhment for the ſame. And if it ſeemeth good unto Polybius, that Antiochus was puniſhed by death for this occaſion, it is farre more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the ſacriledge he had committed in the Temple of Jeruſalem. But our purpoſe is not to argue againſt thoſe that maintain, that Polybius reaſons are of greater truth and conſequence, then ours are.

The yeer of the world, 3802. before christs nativity, 162.

BEfore Antiochus gave up the ghoſt, he called for Philip one of his chiefeſt familiars, and made him governour of his Kingdome. And having delivered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other jewels, he charged him to bear and deliver them to his ſonne Antiochus, requiring him earneſtly to have care of his bringing up, and to maintain the Kingdome in his behalfe, untill he coming unto the yeers of diſcretion, were fit to manage it himſelfe. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred fourty and ninth yeer of the Kingdome of Syria. After that Lyſias had certified the people of the Kings death, he proclaimed his ſonne Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, ſurnaming him Eupator, (according to the inſtructions that were given him.) About that time, the garriſons and Apoſtataes that were in the fortreſſe of Jeruſalem, did much miſchiefe unto the Jews. For ſetting upon thoſe at unawares, who aſcended the Temple to worſhip and offer their ſacrifice, they ſlew them: for the fortreſſe commanded the Temple. For theſe cauſes Iudas reſolved to cut off theſe garriſons, and to that intent he aſſembled all the people, and beſieged it. This enterprize was undertook in the yeer one hundred and fifty, after that Selencus had uſurped the government of thoſe countries. Having therefore made him certain engins, and raiſed divers rams, he induſtriouſly continued the ſiege: But divers of thoſe Apoſtataes that were revolted, and of that garriſon, iſſued out by night, and aſſembling together ſuch men as were of ſo malicious nature as themſelves, they came unto King Antiochus, requiring him that he would not ſuffer them to be abuſed in ſuch ſort by thoſe of our nation; nor ſo careleſly neglected by them, conſidering their diſgrace grew by his fathers ſervice, for whoſe ſake they had forſaken their own religion, and followed his laws and ordinances. Furthermore they inferred, that the fortreſſe was in danger to be ſurprized by Judas, and his aſſociates except ſome preſent ſuccours were ſent unto them. sore displeased, and sent for his Captains and friends, commanding them to hire strange souldiers, and all those in his Kingdome, who were of yeers to bear arms; so that he gathered in short time an army of one hundred thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen, and thirty two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed he out of Antioch, committing his army to Lysias direction. As soon as he came into Idumæa, he went up unto Bethsura a walled citie, and very difficult to be surprized, which he besieged and begirt: but with such a disadvantage, that the Bethsurians resisting him valiantly, and sallying out upon him, burned those preparations and engines which he had furnished for the battery of the town. When as therefore a long time was consumed about the siege, Iudas having intelligence of the Kings approach, raised his campe from before the Castle of Ierusalem, and marching forward to meet the enemy, he shut his army in a certain streight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, some seventy stounds distance from the enemies campe.

Iudas with his forces encountreth the King at Beth-zacharia.

The King having tidings thereof, raised his siege from Bethsura, and marched toward the streight where Iudas army was inclosed, and about the morning he set his souldiers in battell array. He first of all caused his Elephants to march one after another thorow the streight, for that it was impossible for them to march in square. About every Elephant were one thousand footmen, and five hundreth horsemen. These Elephants bare high towers on their backs, garnished with Archers. Touching the rest of his forces he caused them to ascend two severall wayes by the mountains, under the conduct of his most intirest friends, commanding them with a huge shout and cry to charge their enemies, and to discover their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Jews: whereupon, the mountains resounded with fearfull cries of Antiochus armie: Yet was not Iudas any waies amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, he slue almost six hundreth of the forlorn hope. But Eleazar, surnamed Auranes, Iudas brother, seeing a huge Elephant among the rest armed with royall trappings, and supposing that the King was upon the same, he ran against him with a mightie courage; and after he had slain divers of them that environed the Elephant, and scattered the rest, he thrust his sword into the belly of the beast, and wounded him to the death: so that the Elephant falling upon Eleazar, slew him with the weight thereof; and thus nobly died this worthy man, overthrowing a great number of his enemies, through his infinite valour. Iudas seeing his enemies forces so great in number, retired back to Ierusalem to continue his siege: and Antiochus sent part of his army to Bethsura to surprize the same, and with the rest he himselfe marched onward to Ierusalem.

Iudas returneth to Ierusalem, and Antiochus followeth him.

The Bethsurites being afraid of this mightie armie of the King, and seeing their necessary provisions failed them, yeelded up their Citie, after they had taken the Kings oath, that they should receive no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this City, he offered them no injurie; onely he thrust them out disarmed from the Citie, and planted a garrison therein. He spent a long time also in besieging the Temple of Ierusalem, for that they who kept the same, defended it valiantly. For against every engine the King builded and raised up against them, they erected a contrary engine. Their onely want was victuals, because their old provision was consumed, and the ground had not been manured that yeer because it was the seventh; in which, according to the law, the countrey and soile should not be stirred: which was the cause that divers of those that were besieged, fled secretly for want of victuals, in so much that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this estate were they who were besieged in the Temple.

The Temple of Ierusalem besieged.

When as King Antiochus and Lysias the Generall had received tidings, that Philip coming out of Persia, intended to make himself Master and Lord of the countrey; they concluded to give over the siege for that time, and to march forward against Philip, without giving any inkling thereof either to his souldiers or Captains. He onely commanded that Lysias should communicate the same with the Captains, without discovering of his deliberation or enterprize against Philip; and to tell them that for three reasons he levied the siege: first, for the length thereof; next, for the strength of the place; Lastly, for want of victuals, and for many affairs that required some circumspection and carefull foresight in the Kingdome: Furthermore, for that he thought it most expedient to capitulate with the besieged, and contract friendship with all the nation of the Jews, promising and permitting them the exercise of their religion, because they onely rebelled, for that they were deprived of the same; and for that he was assured, that having the grant thereof, they would each of them return into their own countries. When Lysias had expressed and published these reasons, all the Armie and the Captains approved the same.

WHereupon Antiochus sent a herauld to Iudas and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to live according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and having taken an oath and assurance from the King, they surrendred up the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entred the B same, and seeing it to be a place so well fortified, he contrary to his oath, commanded his Army to levell the wall that invironed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with him the high Priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the King to murther Menelaus, if he intended that the Jewes should live in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the Authour of all those evils, by reason of the counsell he had given to Antiochus his father, to inforce the Jews to forsake their religion. The King for that cause sent Menelaus unto Berœa a city of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enjoyed the high Priesthood for the term of ten yeers. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his only ambitious desire of authoritie had inforced our nation to revolt from their religion. C As soon therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made high Priest, who was called Facimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his Countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slew him. But Onias the son of the high Priest (whom as we have heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancy) seeing that the King had slain his uncle Menelaus, and given the Priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the Priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Lysias, he fled unto Ptolomey King of Egypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queen Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signorie, where he builded a Temple like unto that which was at Jerusalem: whereof we shall hereafter have more fit opportunitie to speak. Bacchides Generall of Demetrius Army, cometh to make war against the Jews, and returneth back again unto the King without performance of any thing.

AT that time Demetrius Seleucus son fled from Rome, and took possession of Tripolis in Syria, and after he had set the Diademe upon his head, and had levied and hired certain souldiers, he invaded the kingdome: where he was received to the generall content of all men, who submitting themselves unto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them alive unto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two yeers, as we have already declared in another place. To this new elected King, divers Jewes (banished for their impietie) and with them the high Priest Alcimus made their resort; who in generall accused their Nation, and as principalls Judas and his brethren, objecting against them, that they had slain his friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the kingdome and expected his coming, some of them were slain; and that the rest being driven from their native Countrey, were banished into other places: requiring him that he would send some one of his friends to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Judas and his brethren. Demetrius was much moved by these reports of F theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much esteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose government at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gave an Army, joyning with him the high Priest Alcimus, with commission to kill Judas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his Army, came into Judæa, and sent a certain Herauld to Judas and his brethren to intreat with him upon certain Articles of peace, because his intent was to surprize them by some subtilty and treachery. But Iudas smelling his drift, gave little trust unto him: for in that he came thither with so great an army, he easily conjectured that he intended no peace; but to make warre: notwithstanding, some of the people gave ear unto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their countrey-from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers ſhould any wayes be endammaged by them, they committed themſelves to their protection. But Bacchides ſetting light by his oath, ſlew threeſcore of them; and by this breach of his faith towards theſe, he cauſed others (who intended to ſubmit themſelves) to forſake and flee his government. As ſoon as therefore he had removed his Army from Jeruſalem, he came unto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of thoſe which had fled, and ſome others among the people, he ſlew them all, commanding all thoſe that lived in the countrey to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place for the guard of his perſon a part of his Army: and that done, he returned unto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the mean while Alcimus intending to aſſure his eſtate and government; and ſuppoſing that it ſhould be ſo much the better confirmed, if ſo be he H could obtain the good will of the people, he uſed all kind of plauſible and familiar ſpeech unto them; and deviſing with every man pleaſantly and graciouſly, he adjoyned in ſhort time great forces to thoſe which he had before: amongſt whom there were many fugitives and ungodly men, by whoſe help and aſſiſtance he marched thorow the countrey, killing all thoſe whom he found to be of Iudas faction. Iudas perceiving that Alcimus having gathered great forces, had already ſlain divers of the moſt upright men, and ſuch as feared God in all his Nation, he addreſſed himſelf alſo to overrun the Countrey, and ſlew as many of Alcimus partakers, as he could meet with. Who perceiving in himſelf that he was unable to reſiſt Iudas, made his account to recover Demetrius favor. CHAP. XVII.

Demetrius imagining, that if Iudas ſhould increaſe in power, it ſhould be ſome prejudice to his eſtate, he ſent Nicanor his moſt intire and faithfull friend, to make K warre againſt him: (who was one of them alſo, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Having therefore furniſhed him, in his own opinion, with a ſufficient Army, and able to make head againſt Iudas, he commanded him to ſpare no one of that Nation. As ſoon as Nicanor came to Jeruſalem, he intended not incontinently to make warre upon Iudas, but caſt with himſelf to ſurprize him by ſome ſubtilty: to this intent he ſent him a peaceable meſſage, alledging that it was neither neceſſary nor convenient for him to fight or hazard his fortune; proteſting unto Iudas, that he would offer him no injury; and that he reſorted thither with his friends, onely to expreſs the good affection of King Demetrius towards him, and how well he was affected towards the Nation of the Jewes. L Iudas and his brethren believed this falſe embaſſage of Nicanors, and ſuſpecting no kind of ſiniſter dealing, they gave him credit, and entertained both him and his army. When as therefore Nicanor had ſaluted Iudas, he conferred with him, and in the mean while gave a ſign unto his ſouldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiving and diſcovering his treaſon betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled unto his ſouldiers. When Nicanor ſaw that his intent and ſubtilty was diſcovered, he reſolved to make open war upon Iudas, and to bid him battel neer unto a borough called Caphar-ſalama: in which place obtaining the victory, he conſtrained Iudas to retire himſelf into the fortreſs in Ieruſalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the ſiege of Iudas in the Temple of Ieruſalem, certain of the Prieſts and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reverence, they ſhewed him thoſe M ſacrifices, which (as they ſaid) they intended to offer unto God for the Kings proſperity and health. But he blaſpheming, threatned them, that if the people did not deliver Iudas into his hands, he would deſtroy the Temple upon his return, and with theſe menaces he departed out of the City. Which when the Prieſts heard, they began to ſhed aboundant tears, praying God that it might pleaſe him to defend his ſacred Temple, together with thoſe which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

When as therefore Nicanor departing from Ieruſalem, arrived neer unto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great ſupply of ſouldiers came unto him out of Syria. Now Iudas was incamped in another borough called Adas, about thirty furlongs diſtant from Bethoron, having with him at the moſt not above one thouſand men.

A Notwithstanding he exhorted his souldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies; neither to think with themselves against how many they were to fight; but against whom, and and for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether couragiously set upon the enemie, at such time as he should lead them forth to the onset. Whereupon assailing Nicanor, there arose a dangerous conflict between them; wherein Iudas had the upper hand: for he slew a great number of the enemie, and finally, Nicanor himself fighting couragiously, was slain; and so soon as he fell down dead, his armie betook them to flight. For having lost their Chieftain, they dispearsed themselves and cast away their weapons: Judas speedily pursuing them, made a great slaughter, and by sound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that he had discomfited the enemie. Whereupon the B inhabitants thereabout understanding hereof, betook them to their weapons, and meeting with those that fled in the foreward, slew them, so that no one escaped from this battel, notwithstanding they were to the number of nine thousand. This victorie happened on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countrey-men call it, and the Macedonians Distre: And hereof each year there is both a solemn feast & memorial observed. From this time forward the nation of the Jews were in quiet without any invasion, and lived in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combats and dangers. Whereas therefore the high Priest Alcimus intended to beat down an old wall of the Sanctuarie, which had been builded by the holy Prophets, he was suddenly struken by God; so that he incon- C tinently lost his speech, and fell to the ground; and after he had indured many grievous torments for divers days, at last he died miserably, after he had enjoyed the Priesthood for the space of four years.

Alcimus the high Priest dieth.

After his death, the people with a general consent gave his place to Judas. Who understanding of the great power of the Romans, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spain, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perseus and Philip, and besides all these, the great King Antiochus, determined to make friendship with them, and sent Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar his two entire friends unto Rome, to intreat the Romans to be their allies and confederates, and to write unto Demetrius, that he should give over to war against D the Jews. When the Embassadours were sent from Judas, were arrived in Rome, the Senate entertained them; and after they had discoursed with them upon the occasion of their Embassage, they accepted and concluded upon their alliance, and made a Decree, the Copie whereof was then brought into Judæa, and the original reserved in the Capitol, engraven in a Table of Brass. Which arrest or Decree of the Romans, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare unto the Jews, contained these Articles: That no man under the E obedience of the Romans, should maintain warre against the nation of the Jews: neither should furnish them with victuals, ships, or silver, who should make war upon them. And if any enemies should assail the Jews, the Romans should give them succour to the uttermost of their power. And that likewise if any one should make warre against the Romans, the Jews should succour them. That if the Jewish nation would adde or diminish any thing of that association, it should be done with the common advice of the people of Rome, and that that which should be ordained, should remain irrevocable. This arrest was written by Eupolemus the sonne of John, and by Jason the sonne of Eleazar, at such time as Judas was high Priest, and his brother Simon General over the Armie. See here, how the first amitie and alliance was contracted between the Romans and the Jews.

Bacchides is sent once again into Judæa, and obtaineth a victory.

F WHen as Nicanors death, and the discomfiture of his armie was reported to Demetrius, he sent a new armie into Iudæa, under the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and repairing to Iudæa, encamped in Arbela a Citie of Galilee: where having enforced, conquered and taken a great number of those that were retired into caves, he departed from thence, and repaired in all haste to Ierusalem. And understanding that Judas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out against him with twentie thousand foot-men, and two thousand horsmen. Now Judas had not on his side in all above two thousand men, who perceiving the multitude of Bacchides souldiers were afraid, so that some of them forsaking their camp, fled away: by which means there remained no moe with Judas, but eight hundreth men. Seeing himself therefore abandoned by so many of his men, and pressed by his enemies, who gave him neither truce nor time to re-assemble his forces, he resolved to fight with those eight hundreth which he had: whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiently; but they answered, that they were insufficient to make head against so high an army, and counselled him to retire, and to stand on his guard for that time, until he had gathered forces that might be able to confront the enemy. But Judas replied to this effect: God forbid (said he) that the Sun should see me turn my back upon mine enemies. And if by this means I meet with my death, and that I must needs spend my last bloud in this battel, I will never soyle so many notable actions so worthily atchieved, nor stain so much glory obtained with so great vertue by one ignominious flight. And having in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those souldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselves altogether against the enemy.

BUt Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battel, placing the horsmen on both the wings; his light-armed souldiers and archers in the front of the army; and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and he himself led the right wing of the battel. And in this array he approached Judas camp, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding his souldiers to give a great shout, and to charge their enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides: so that on both sides there was most cruel conflict, which continued until the Sun-set. And when as Judas perceived that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certain number of his most resolute souldiers, & drew towards that quarter, and setting upon them, he brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to flie, and pursued them as far as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiving the flight of those in the right, went after Judas, and inclosed him on the back-part. He being unable to flie, and seeing himself inclosed by his enemies, resolved with his souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore he had slain a great number of his enemies, and being infeebled more through wearinesse, then by the wounds received of them, he fell to the ground, and was himself at last slain likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploits. His souldiers seeing him dead, and having no governour of respect left amongst them after the loss of so valiant a Captain, betook them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers upon intreaty recovered his body, and carried it to Modin (a place where his father was buried); there was he interred by all the people, who wept for him divers dayes, and honoured him publickly according to the custome of their countrey. Such was Judas end, who was a valiant man, a great warrier, & very respective of the commandments of his father Mathias, having done and suffered all that he might for the liberty of his countrey. Being therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he hath left behind him a perpetual renown of his worthy acts, and an honourable memory of himself obtained by the liberty, in which he re-established his nation, retiring them from the servitude of the Macedonians: who died also after he had discharged the office of the high Priest, for the space of three years.

WE have declared in our former book, how the nation of the Iews (after they had been under the subjection of the Macedonians) recovered their libertie: we have likewise discovered the great and grievous conflicts, which Iudas their Captain performed, and in which he finally died in the behalf of their libertie: how likewise (after the death of Iudas) all the wicked Apostate Iews, who had revolted from their religion, took courage, molesting and doing many injuries to the rest of their countreymen. Finally, how besides their malice, the famine invaded the countrey; so that divers being unable to sustain these two mortall scourges of Famine and Warre, were constrained to submit themselves unto the Macedonians. In the mean while, Bacchides gathering together the false Apostates (who were falne from the religion of the Jews, with an intent to live after the prophane manner of Pagans) committed the government of the countrey unto them, who laying hold on Judas friends and partakers, betrayed and delivered them to Bacchides: who first of all tormented and beat them at his pleasure, and afterwards put them to death. This so grievous affliction (then which the Iews had never endured a worse, since their return from Babylon) was the cause that those of Iudas faction, who were yet alive, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addressed themselves to Ionathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Iudas vertues, and to have no less care of his countreymen, then the other had; who fought for their liberty untill his latest breath, requiring him not to abandon the government of his Nation, especially in that so miserable estate wherein they were plunged. Ionathan answered them, that he was ready to die for them, and being in all things esteemed no less valiant and politique then his brother Iudas, he was proclaimed Generall and Chieftain of the Jews.

Bacchides murthereth those of Judas faction.

Bacchides having notice hereof, feared lest Ionathan should be no less infestuous to the King and Macedonians, then his brother Iudas before him had been, for which cause he sought the means to make him away by Treason. But both Ionathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence thereof; and having discovered his practice, they took all their families with them, and fled into the desart that confined the Citie Ierusalem: and retiring themselves neer unto a water called the lake of Asphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceived that they mistrusted him, and were driven thither; he went out against them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other side of Iordan, he gathered his army together. Ionathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seek him, sent his brother John (sirnamed Gaddis) unto the Arabians, Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their goods unto their hand, untill the end of the warre betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whilest therefore Iohn marched towards the Nabatheans the sons of Amraus laid an ambuscado for him (who were of the Citie of Medaba) and after they had furiously set upon him on the way, and laid hold on whatsoever he brought with him, they at length slew him and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his bretheren, as we will make manifest in that which afterward followeth.

John the brother of Judas is slain by Amars sonne.

When Bacchides knew that Ionathan was incamped in the marshes of Iordan, he made choice of the Sabbath day to set upon him, hoping that he would not defend himself on that day, because of the prohibition of the Law. But he contrary to his expectation, encouraged his companions, and declared unto them how it concerned their lives to be valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut up in the midst betwixt the flood and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the flood on their backs. As soon therefore as he had made his prayer unto God, that it might please him to grant him the victory, he set upon the enemy with a stout courage, and slew a great number of them: and perceiving Bacchides how with great fierceneſle he set forward against him, he stretched out his right hand to strike him; but he preventing the stroke by stepping aside, Ionathan and his companions lept into the river, and so saved themselves by swimming over to the other side of Iordan, because the enemies durst not passe the water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Ierusalem (after he had lost about some two thousand of his men.) After this, he fortified divers Cities (which were beforetime ruinated) namely, Iericho, Emaus, Betheron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in every of them certain towers, and great and strong walls, and afterwards he planted garrisons therein, to sally out upon the Iews, and vex them; but in especiall he fortified the Cittadel of Ierusalem, in which he kept for hostages the children of the principallest men of Iudæa.

About that time there came a certain man to Ionathan and his brother Simon, bringing them news that the sons of Amraeus would solemnize their nuptials, and were to lead the bride from the City of Gabatha, which was daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians: for which cause she should be conducted with great magnificence and sumptuous pomp. Ionathan and his brother, supposing that a fit opportunity was offered them to revenge their brothers death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done unto their brother, they took with them the greatest forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba; where they lay in ambush under the covert of a mountain. But when they saw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroom, and a great troup of their friends

For not onely theſe alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wives and children, were all of them ſlain, to the number of four hundred. And in this manner Simon and Ionathan returned into the marſhes aforeſaid, and abode there. But Bacchides having fortified all the garriſons of Judea, returned back unto the King. And at that time the eſtate of the Jews was in peace for the ſpace of well-nigh two yeers.

But the wicked, and ſuch as were revolted from the religion of the Iews, ſeeing that Ionathan and his followers converſed in the country in great aſſurance, by reaſon of the peace; they ſent certain Embaſſadors unto King Demetrius, requiring him to ſend them Bacchides, who might apprehend Ionathan, declaring that it might eaſily be done, and that in one night breaking in upon them, he might murther them all before they were aware. When Bacchides by the Kings commandment came into Iewry, he wrote unto all his friends both Iews and alſo his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Ionathan: but when by no policie nor proweſſe of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Ionathan having notice of their ambuſhes, ſtood upon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates or fugitives, objecting againſt them that they had deceived both the King and him: and laying hold of fiftie on the principalleſt of them, he put them to death. But Ionathan and his brother, with thoſe of their company, retired themſelves into Bethalaga (a certain village in the deſart) for fear of Bacchides; in which place he builded towers, and walls to keep his garriſon in more ſecuritie. Bacchides underſtanding hereof, took the army that he had with him, and thoſe Jews that were his confederates, and marched forward againſt Ionathan; where battering thoſe fortifications that were made by him, he beſieged him for many daies. But Ionathan for all his buſie ſiege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but reſiſted him valiantly; and leaving his brother Simon in the City to make head againſt Bacchides, he ſecretly ſtole out, and gathered a great number of ſouldiers that favoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides camp; and after he had there ſlain a number of them, he gave his brother Simon notice of his coming: who aſſoon as he heard the noiſe in the enemies camp, haſtily iſſued forth with his ſouldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians engines, and for his part alſo made a great ſlaughter of them. Bacchides ſeeing that he was circumvented by his enemies, and that both before and behinde he was preſſed by them, being aſtoniſhed at this ſo hard, ſudden and unexpected encounter, was almoſt out of his wits; ſo ſore was he confuſed at the iſſue of his ſiege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cauſe he diſcharged all his choler upon thoſe Apoſtataes, (ſuppoſing he was abuſed by them, who had ſent unto the King and had cauſed him to be ſent thither:) and full gladly would he have returned home, could he but make an end of the ſiege without his diſhonour.

Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch unto his King, and after that retreat he never made warre again upon Iudea. But Ionathan having obtained this ſecuritie, went and dwelt in the town of Machmas: where adminiſtring and governing the Common-weal, he executed ſuch ſevere juſtice on thoſe that were revolted from the religion of their countrey, that he cleanſed the nation of all ſuch kinde of men.

Alexander the ſonne of Antiochus Epiphanes, maketh warre againſt Demetrius.

Hedio & Ruſſinus, chap. 11. Alexander the ſonne of Antiochus Epiphanes cometh into Syria, and ſeizeth Ptolomais.

IN the hundred and ſixtie yeer, Alexander the ſonne of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and ſeized the citie of Ptolemais, by treaſon of thoſe ſouldiers that were therein; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reaſon of his arrogancy, which was ſuch, that he granted no man acceſſe unto him: for being locked up in a royall fort defenced with four towers (which himſelf had builded neer unto Antioch) he ſuffered no man to approach his preſence, but was careleſſe and wholly negligent in his affairs; living in pleaſure and idleneſſe: whereby he grew into great hatred among his ſubjects, as we have alreadie declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had ſeized Ptolemais, he gathered all his forces and marched forth againſt him.

Demetrius warre againſt Alexander. 1 Mac. 10.

MOreover, he ſent Embaſſadours unto Ionathan, that might confirm an alliance and ratifie a friendſhip betwixt them: for he determined with himſelf to prevent Alexander, for fear leſt he capitulating with him firſt of all, ſhould obtain his aſſiſtance. And this did he eſpecially for the fear he had of Ionathan, leſt remembring thoſe injuries he had before time received at his hands, he ſhould oppoſe himſelf againſt him. He therefore ſent unto him requiring him to aſſemble his forces, and to make preparation for the warre: commanding likewiſe, that thoſe Jews ſhould be delivered into his poſſeſſion, whom Bacchides had ſhut up for hoſtages in the fortreſſe of Jeruſalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himſelf in this ſort, Ionathan reſorted to Jeruſalem, and in the preſence of all the people, and of the garriſon that was in the fortreſſe, he read the Kings Letters; and after the reading thereof, the curſed and revolted Jews that were in the fortreſſe were ſore afraid, ſeeing that the King permitted Ionathan to levy an army, and to receive the hoſtages. But he receiving them into his hands, reſtored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this means remained Jonathan in Jeruſalem, where he made divers reparations and buildings, according as him pleaſed. For he builded the Citie walls of hewn ſtone, to make them more forcible againſt the aſſaults of warre. Which when they perceived who were in the garriſons thorowout all Judea, they forſook them all, and retired back to Antioch, except they that were in the Citie of Bethſura, and thoſe in the fortreſſe of Jeruſalem: for they conſiſted for the moſt part of thoſe Jews that had abandoned their religion, who for that occaſion feared to forſake their garriſons.

Hedio & Ruſſinus, chap 8.

BUt Alexander knowing what promiſes Demetrius had made unto Ionathan, and being well aſſured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himſelf againſt the Macedonians; moreover how he was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: He told his friends and familiars that it was impoſſible for him to meet with a better allie at that time then Ionathan, who had approved himſelf a valiant man againſt his enemies, and ſo particular cauſes bare hatred againſt Demetrius, from whom he had received many injuries, and on whom he had wrought ſundrie revenges: for which cauſe if they thought it good to draw him unto their ſide againſt Demetrius, the time was very fit to entertain and confirm a mutuall peace betwixt them; which advice of his being approved by his favourites; he ſent a Letter unto Ionathan to this effect: King Alexander to Ionathan his brother, Health: We have long ſithence underſtood of your valour and fidelitie, which hath cauſed us to ſend our Embaſſadours unto you, to intreat with you of alliance and amitie betwixt us; and from this day forward, we elect and ordain you high Prieſt of the Jews, and receive you into the number of our chiefeſt friends. Moreover in way of preſent, I ſend you a purple robe, and a crown of gold, exhorting you, that ſince you are thus honoured by us, you will in like ſort yeeld us an anſwerable reſpect and friendſhip. Ionathan having received this Letter, inveſted himſelf in the habit of the high Prieſt, and

A and the day of the feast of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth year after the death of his brother Judas. (For during all that time there had not been any high Priest.) He assembled also a great number of souldiers, and caused a great quantity of armours and weapons to be forged. The year of the world, 3813. before the Nativity of Christ, 151.

When Demetrius heard this news, he was much troubled, and accused himself of sloth and too much negligence in looking to his affairs, for that he had not prevented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Ionathan, but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. He sent letters likewise to Ionathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Ionathan, and to all the nation of the Jews, health. "Since you have observed "the friendship that you bear unto us, and have not intangled your selves with our enemies, "notwithstanding their divers sollicitations, we praise your fidelity, and pray you to perse- Demetrius studieth by promises to assure himself of Jonathans friendship.

B "vere in the same estate, assuring you that you shall receive the like favours from us, in all "integrity. For I will forgive you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you have "usually paid, either to the Kings my predecessors, or to me; and from this time forward, I "acbuit you from those tributes you are to pay hereafter. And moreover I releas you of the "price of salt, & of the gold which you were wont to give unto us for our Crown. We like- "wise acquit you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, & the half of the fruit of your trees, "which heretofore you have been accustomed to pay me, to keep and hold them peaceably "from this time forward. I acquit you also at this present for ever, of all that which the in- "habitants of Judea, and the three Provinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Pe-

C "ræa, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the City of Jerusalem be held sa- "cred, and to have the right of the freedom, except from all tributes and tenths, both in it "self, and also the countrey belonging thereunto. And I commit the fortress in the same to "the hands of Ionathan the high Priest, permitting him to plant such a garrison therein, as in "his opinion shall be held both honest and lawful; and such as will faithfully maintain it to "his use. I will also that all the Jews, who are imprisoned in my countrey, be set at liberty. "Moreover, it is my pleasure, that no horses of the Jews be taken up to run post for us: I grant "also on the Sabbaths, and other festival days; yea, three days also before every one of those "feasts, libertie and freedom be used. And my will is, that the Jews, who inhabit within my

D "dominions, be likewise freed of all molestations. The like priviledg grant I them that will "bear arms with me, to the number of thirtie thousand: who in what place soever they "shall be, shall have no worser entertainment then mine own army: and part of them will I "place in my garrisons; the rest shall be of my guard; and I will make them Captains in my "Court, and will permit them to live according to the ordinances of their countrey, which "they shall observe: and I will also that the three governments annexed to Iudea be made "subject unto the same laws. My pleasure is in like manner, that the high Priest shall take or- "der, that no Jew adore in any other temple then in Ierusalem; and of my own charge I give "every yeer an hundred & fifty thousand sicles of silver to be employed in making sacrifices:

E "and that which shall be over and above those sacrifices, my pleasure is that it shall be yours. "Moreover, I acquit the Priests and Ministers of the Temple, of the ten thousand drachmes "of silver (which the Kings levied on the Temple) because they appertain unto the Priests "who serve in the Temple; as I have been rightly informed. I grant also to all those who "shall repair unto the Tempie of Ierusalem, for refuge, and within the precincts thereof (whe- "ther it be for money due unto the King, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof "and receive not any damage in their goods. I permit also, that the temple be repaired and "builded at my charge. My will is also, that the walls of the city be reedified, and that certain "towers be builded about the same, at my costs. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to "build fortresses and strong holds in, thorow all the countrey of Iudea, and to place garrisons "in them, my will is that all this be done and fortified, at the charges levied out of mine own

F "coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made unto the Iews.

But King Alexander having gathered great forces, as well of strange and hired souldiers as of those who in Syria had revolted from Demetrius, let forth his whole army against the enemy; and after the ensignes were displayed and the onset given, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders souldiers that fought against it to flie; and his men pursuing them hard at heels, spoyled their camp. But the right wing in which the King himself was, being forced to retire, was discomfited: and as for the rest, they betook them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly, slew some of his enemies; and in pursuing other some, who could not endure his fierce assault, was in the end, by setting spurres to his horse mainly carried into a deep and muddie bogge, whereinto by misadventure his horse fell, and being unable to get out; he was slain in that place. For being discovered by his enemies, they turned back upon The battel between Alexander and Demetrius, and of Demetrius death.

upon him; and having incloſed him, they altogether ſhot their arrows againſt him: who being on foot and fighting valiantly, was at length ſlain, after he had received divers wounds, and was no more able to ſuſtain himſelf. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleventh yeer of his reign, as we have diſcourſed in another place. G

Onias winneth the favour of Ptolomey Philometor, and obtaineth leave of him to build a Temple in Egypt, which was called the Temple of Onias.

Hedio & Ruffinus chap. 4. Onias the ſon of Onias the high Prieſt ſeeketh to build a Temple in Egypt.

The yeer of the world, 3814. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 150.

BUt Onias the ſonne of the High Prieſt, called alſo Onias (who flying out of his countrey lived in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as we have heretofore declared) ſeeing all Judea deſtroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending in his heart to purchaſe an immortall memory, he determined to beſeech the King Ptolomey, and the Queen Cleopatra by Letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a Temple in Egypt, reſembling in all points that which was at Ieruſalem, and that he might have liberty to plant Levites and Prieſts in the ſame, of his own kindred: And hereunto was he eſpecially mooved, by a certain prophecy of Iſaiah, who more then ſix hundreth yeers before, had foretold that a Temple ſhould be aſſuredly builded in Egypt, in honour of the Almighty God by a Iew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect. "During the time that I was imployed in "your warres, and by Gods favourable aſſiſtance have done you many ſervices. I have viſi- I "ted Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, and have been in the City of Leontopolis (which is in the "territories of Heliopolis.) I have alſo viſited divers other places, wherein the Iews have "Temples, againſt all right and honeſty: which is the cauſe that they agree not among them- "ſelves: as alſo the like hath hapned among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Tem- "ples and the grreat diverſity of Religions. And having found out a very convenient place "neer a Caſtle called Bubaſtis in the Plain, where there is ſtore of all ſorts of ſtuffe for buil- "ding and cattel fit for ſacrifice, I beſeech you that it may be lawful for me to purifie the "Temple that is levelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no ſacred power; "and that in the place thereof, it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a Temple in honour "of the higeſt God, according to the pattern and the ſame dimenſions of that Temple K "which is in Ieruſalem, for the preſervation and proſperity both of you, your Queen, and chil- "dren; and to the intent that thoſe Iews that dwell in Egypt may aſſemble and ſerve God "therein; for that by how much the more there is unitie and concord among themſelves, by "ſo much the more may they be diſpoſed to your ſervice. For to this effect is the prophecy "of Iſaiah, which ſaith thus: There ſhall be (ſaith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many "other things alſo hath he foretold as touching this place.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolomey. And by his anſwer which he made hereunto, a man may eaſily conjecture what pietie was both in him, and Cleopatra his ſiſter, and wife. For they have returned the ſin and tranſgreſſion of the Law, which L through this means fell upon Onias head, by this anſwer that enſueth: King Ptolomey and Queen Cleopatra to Onias the high Prieſt, Health. "We have peruſed your Letters, by which "you require us to give you licence to cleanſe the Temple, that is defaced at Leontopolis, "in the ſeignorie of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubaſtis in the Plain. We marvel very "much, that a Temple builded in a place ſo unclean and full of execrable beaſts, ſhould be "agreeable unto God: but ſince that you inform us, that the Prophet Iſaiah did long time "ſithence prophecy the ſame, we give you licence, if it may be done according to the Law, "and with this condition, that we committ not any ſin againſt God.

A Temple builded in Egypt by Ptolomeys conſent.

Upon this anſwer, Onias (taking poſſeſſion of the place) builded therein a Temple, and M erected an Altar unto God, according to the module of the Temple of Jeruſalem; but far leſs, and leſs rich. Yet think I it no wayes requiſite to declare the dimenſions thereof, neither the veſſels in the ſame, becauſe I deſcribe them particularly in my ſeventh book of the warres, and captivitie of the Jews: neither wanted there ſome Levites and Prieſts, who being anſwerable to Onias in devotion and zeal, frequented the divine Service in that place, and renewed the ceremonies. But let this ſuffice for the preſent as touching the Temple.

Sedition betwixt the Iews and Samaritanes, as touching their Temple.

But it came to paſs, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the ſervice and worſhip of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the great, fell at odds, and debated their differences before Ptolommey. For the Jews ſaid that the Temple in

A Ieruſalem builded, according to Moſes laws and ordinances, was the lawfull Temple, but the Samaritanes maintained, that that which was builded on mount Garrizim, was the true Temple. They therefore beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſit in judgement, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalf, and to condemne the party unto death, who ſhould be found faulty in his proceſſe. Now the advocates which pleaded for the Samaritans, were Sabbæus and Theodoſius: and Andronicus the ſonne of Meſſalem defended the cauſe of thoſe of Jeruſalem, and the other Iews. And both of them ſwore both by God and the King, that they would bring their proves according to the law, beſeeching Ptolomey to adjudge him to death, whom he ſhould finde to have falſified his oath. The King therefore ſate down with his friends, both to hear the cauſe, and determine upon their differences. But the Iews of Alexandria were ſore moved and diſpleaſed againſt them, B that had drawn the preeminence of the Temple in Ieruſalem into queſtion, and were highly diſcontent that a Temple ſo ancient and famous, and ſo eſteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, ſhould in ſuch ſort be diſgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbæus and Theodoſius ſuffered Andronicus to declaim firſt: who began to approve the lawfulneſſe, holineſſe, and religion of the Temple in Ieruſalem out of the Law; and by the ſucceſſive government of the high Prieſts, who from father to ſonne, and from hand to hand, had received this honour; therein alleadging that all the Kings of Aſia had honoured the Majeſtie of that place with preſents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor courſe of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any eſtimation. By theſe and ſuch like words, Andronicus perſwaded the King, that the Temple of Ieruſalem was builded ac- C cording to the ordinance of Moſes, inviting him to adjudge Sabbæus and Theodoſius to death. This may ſuffice as touching the differences of the Iews of Alexandria, and ſuch things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

Alexander after Demetrius death honoured Ionathan greatly.

D After that Demetrius was ſlain in fight (according as we have heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter anſwerable to his dignitie, to contract affinitie with him; firſt, ſince he had obtained his fathers Empire by the favour of God: and next, for that he had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to theſe his demands, and entertaining them with great pleaſure, wrote back that he was very glad that he had recovered his fathers Kingdome; promiſing him to give him his daughter in marriage; giving him to underſtand, that he would meet him at Ptolomais, and bring his daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After he had written theſe letters, Ptolomey made his ſpeedie repair to Ptolemais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra; where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointmen) he delivered him his daugh- E ter, with ſuch a dowry of gold and ſilver, as well beſeemed his kingly magnificence. Unto the ſolemniſing of this marriage, Alexander by letters invited the high Prieſt Ionathan, commanding him to repair unto him to Ptolemais. Where, after he was arrived, and had both preſented his ſervice with other magnificent preſents to both the Kings; he was highly honoured by both, inſomuch as Alexander conſtrained him to put off his ordinarie garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to ſit upon a royall Throne: commanding his Captains to march before him thorow the Citie; & to command by publike edict, that no man ſhould dare to ſpeak any thing againſt him, neither offer him any cauſe of diſcontent in what ſort ſoever. All which the Captains performed; ſo that they, who purpoſely and maliciouſly repaired thither to accuſe him, ſeeing the honour that was done unto him by his publication, fled away haſtily, for fear leſt ſome miſhap ſhould befall them. This King Alexander loved F Ionathan ſo intirely, that he afforded him the chiefeſt place amongſt the number of his deareſt friends.

Demetrius the ſonne of Demetrius overcometh Alexander, obtaineth the Kingdome, and contracteth friendſhip with Jonathan.

The yeer of the world, 3818. before Chriſts Nativity, 146.

IN the hundred ſixtie and fifth yeer (of the reigne of the Greeks) Demetrius the ſonne of Demetrius (accompanied with divers hired ſouldiers, whom Laſthenes Candidot furniſhed him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which newes as ſoon as Alexander heard, he was grievouſly vexed and troubled: for which cauſe he inſtantly poſted from Phœnicia to Antioch, with intent to aſſure the affairs of his Kingdome in that place, before the arrivall of Demetrius. He left behinde him for his Governour in Cœloſyria Apollonius Danus: who coming unto Jamnia with a great army, ſent a meſſenger unto the high Prieſt Ionathan, ſignifying unto him, that it was not convenient that he onely ſhould live in aſſurance at his own eaſe and in authority, without ſubmitting himſelf unto a King; and that it was a great indignitie for him in all men eyes, for that he had not inforced himſelf to ſtoop under the obedience of a King. For which cauſe (ſaid he) deceive not thy ſelf, neither hope thou by ſculking in the mountians, or depending on thy forces, to continue thy greatneſſe; but if thou truſted to thy power, come down into the field, and encounter with me and my army in the Plain, to the end that the iſſue of the victory may ſhew which of us is moſt valiant. Be not thou ſo ignorant that the nobleſt of every City bear arms under one, who have alwayes evercome thy predeceſſors. For which cauſe I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may uſe our ſwords and no ſtones; and where the vanquiſhed ſhall have no advantage by his flight. Ionathan whetted by this bitter meſſage, choſe out ten thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and departed from Jeruſalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came unto Joppe, and encamped without the City (becauſe the citizens had ſhut the gates againſt him) for they had a garriſon planted in that place by Apollonius. But as ſoon as he addreſſed himſelf to batter the Citie, the inhabitants were afraid, for fear leſt he ſhould ſurpriſe the ſame by force, and for that cauſe they opened him the gates. Apollonius underſtanding that Joppe was taken by Ionathan, he took three thouſand horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his army with a ſober march, foot by foot; and arriving at Joppe, he retired back to draw Ionathan into the field, aſſuring himſelf upon his horſemen, and grounding his hope of victory upon them. But Ionathan iſſuing out boldly, purſued Apollonius as farre as Azot: who finding himſelf in the champain field, turned back upon him and charged him. Ionathan was in no ſort abaſhed to ſee the thouſand horſemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambuſh neer unto a certain ſtream, to the end they might charge the Jews behinde, but diſpoſed his army in ſuch ſort, that his ſouldiers on every ſide turned their faces upon the enemie; commanding his men to defend themſelves on both ſides, fighting with thoſe that aſſailed them either in the vantguard or the rereward. This battell continued untill evening, and Ionathan had given his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to ſet upon the enemies battell: as for himſelf, he drew himſelf and his ſouldiers into a form of a battalion reſembling a Tortoiſe, to the end that being covered with their bucklers, joyned the one with the other, they might beat off the horſemens arrows: to which all of them ſhewed themſelves obedient. The enemies horſemen ſhooting all their arrows againſt them, did them no harm; for they pierced not as farre as the fleſh, but lighting upon the bucklers (encloſed and faſtned the one within the other) they were eaſily beaten back and born off, and fell down being ſhot all in vain. But when as the enemies were wearied with ſhooting from betimes in the morning untill evening, and that Simon perceived they could charge no further, he ſet upon them with his ſouldiers ſo courageouſly, that he put them all to flight. The horſemen of Apollonius perceiving that the footmen were diſarraid, grew heartleſſe likewiſe, and wearied alſo, for that they had fought untill the evening: and having loſt the hope that they had in their footmen, they took their flight in great diſorder and confuſion: ſo that they brake their ranks of themſelves, and were ſcattered thorow all the plain. Ionathan alſo purſued them as farre as Azot, and taking the City by aſſault, he ſlew divers of them, conſtraining the reſt that were in deſpair to flie into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the Citie by aſſault, he burned it with the villages round about, and ſpared not the Temple of Dagon, but burned it & all thoſe that were therein. The number as well of thoſe that were ſlain in the battell, as of thoſe that were conſumed by fire in the Temple, was eight thouſand men. Having therefore in this ſort diſcomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched toward Aſcalon: and as he was encamped without the City, the Aſcalonites came out unto him, and both preſented and honoured

The year of world, 3818. before Chriſts Nativity, 146.

As ſoon as Alexander heard that Apollonius the General of his army was diſcomfited, and forced to flie, he made a ſhew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was againſt his will that Jonathan had been moleſted by warre, who was both his friend & his ally. Whereupon he ſent an Ambaſſadour unto him, to ſignifie unto him how much he rejoyced at his victory, offering him preſents and honours, with a chain of gold, ſuch as the Kings were accuſtomed to give to thoſe of their kindred: he likewiſe gave him Accaron and the countrey thereunto

Alexander ſendeth preſents to Jonathan.

About the ſame time King Ptolomey Philometor ſet out an army by ſea, and another by land to repair into Syria, and to ſuccour his ſonne in law Alexander: and in his way all the cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as far as the City of Azot; in which place all of them exclaimed before him, and challenged juſtice at his hand, for that the temple of Dagon was burned and deſtroyed; accuſing Jonathan for the firing thereof, and the ſlaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing theſe accuſations, anſwered them not a word: But when Jonathan came to meet him at Joppe, he courted him with royal preſents, and all the honour that was poſſi-

C ble, and after he had kept him company as far as the flood called Eleutherus, he diſmiſſed him, and ſent him back to Jeruſalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolemais, he hardly eſcaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexanders own complotting, and Ammonius his friends mediation: Which treachery being diſcovered, Ptolomey wrote unto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might be puniſhed for his treaſon and conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, which in their natures required a ſevere and cruel puniſhment. But ſeeing that Alexander delivered him not up into his hands, he conjectured and concluded, that he himſelf was the author thereof, and conceived a hainous diſpleaſure againſt him. In like manner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the means of the ſaid Ammonius, who had loaden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the end Ammonius was puniſhed for theſe his outragious miſdemeanors, and diſgracefully ſlain like a Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 7. Ptolomey Philometor repaireth into Syria with an army to aſſiſt his ſon in law Alexander.

Jonathan meeteth with Ptolomey, and is honourably entertained by him.

Treaſon intended againſt Ptolomey and diſcovered: for which cauſe he taketh away his daughter from Alexander & giveth her to Demetrius for his wife.

At that time Ptolomey began to accuſe himſelf for beſtowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refuſing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: ſo that he brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawn his daughter from him, he preſently ſent Ambaſſadors unto Demetrius to confirm a league of peace and affinity with him promiſing him to beſtow his daughter upon him in marriage, and to eſtabliſh him in his fathers kingdome. Demetrius very joyful to hear of this Ambaſſage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There onely remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to ſurmount, which was, how he might perſwade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, againſt whom they

E were ſo grievouſly incenſed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty overcame he by this means that enſueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, becauſe of Ammonius (as we have expreſſed heretofore) and by that means were the more eaſily drawn to drive him out of the City. He perceiving himſelf to be thruſt out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came unto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and ſouldiers therein proclaimed King, and was conſtrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Aſia, the other as King of Egypt. He was a man of a gentle and juſt nature, no wayes ambitious; but ſuch a one as did prudently forecaſt what was to enſue: ſtriving by all means poſſible to avoid the hatred and jealouſie of the Romanes. For which cauſe aſſembling the Antiochians together, he wrought ſo much with them, that at laſt he per-

F ſwaded them to accept of Demetrius, aſſuring them that if he ſhould receive that benefit at their hands, he would no more keep in memory thoſe things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father; proteſting for his own part, that he would inſtruct him both how to order the courſe of his life honeſtly, and to mannage his publick affairs rightly; and promiſing them that if he attemped to work them any inconvenience, he himſelf would be the formoſt to chaſtiſe him; alleadging for his own part that he would content himſelf to be King of Egypt. And by this meanes the Antiochians were induced to receive Demetrius.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great army, and was come into Syria, and had burned and ſpoiled the countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanied with his ſonne Demetrius (for he had already married his daughter unto him) iſſued

out with their armies, and obtained a joynt and mutual victory, by overcoming Alexander, G

who was constrained to flie into Arabia. It came to passe in that conflict, that Ptolomies horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled and stumbled in such sort, as he threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceived, they ran all together upon him, and gave him divers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to have been slain, unlesse his guard had rescued him; notwithstanding he was so sick for four dayes space, that he could neither hear nor speak. But Zabel the Potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head unto Ptolomey; who being somewhat come unto himself after his wounds on the fifth day, and having some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightful in his ear, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemy. But some H few dayes after he died himself, being full of joy in that he saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamed Balles, reigned for the space of five years, as we have elsewhere declared.

Ptolomey his death.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor, having obtained the kingdome, began thorough his malice to dismembar Ptolomie's army; forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomie's daughter. But the men of war hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselves from his wickednesse; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the High Priest Jonathan having assembled an army of all the countrey of Judea, began to besiege the castle of Jerusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a I great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Jewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Jonathan had raised to surprise the place, in the strength whereof they reposed too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came unto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased thereat, and taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make war upon Jonathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, he wrote to Jonathan and commanded him to come unto him: notwithstanding Jonathan gave not over the siege, but took the Elders & the Priests with him, with gold and silver, robes, & a great quantity of presents to bear unto Demetrius, and when he had delivered them into his hands, he appeased his wrath; and K after he had received many honours at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his Priesthood, in as ample manner, as he enjoyed it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Jewes accused him, yet did not Demetrius give them any credit. Moreover, Jonathan requiring that for the whole countrey of Jewry, & for the three governments of Samaria, Joppe, and Galilee, he might pay no more then three hundred talents for tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his letters patents in these tearms: King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Jewes; peace and joy. We have sent you the copy of the letter, that we have written to Lasthenes, our father, to the end
» joy and peace. Because the people of the Jewes are our confederates, and observe our ordi» nances, my intent is ro requite their good affection, and to assign them the three governments L
» of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which have been taken from » Samaria and annexed to Judea. Secondly, we remit all that which our predecessors Kings received of them that sacrificed in Jerusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered for the fruits of the earth and the trees; the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was levied for the Crown so that hence forward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands, either for the time present or to come. See you therefore give order that the copy of these our present letters be sent and delivered to Jonathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred Temple. See here what he wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiving that the countrey was in peace, and that he lived without fear of any warre, he dismissed his army, and cashiered his souldiers; hiring onely certain stangers (who were mu- M stred out of Candy and other Isles) whereby it came to passe that his own souldiers conceived an envy and hatred against him, in that he gave them no wages; whereas his predecessors maintained them as well in peace as in warre, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards him; and that if need requried to employ them, they might shew themselves more ready and couragious to fight for them.

CHAP. IX.

The year of the world, 3820. before christs Nativity. 144.

Tryphon Apamenus overcometh Demetrius. and giveth the kingdome to Antiochus the ſon of Alexander, and plighteth friendſhip with Jonathan.

A CErtain man called Diodotus, and by ſurname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation, and General of Alexanders army) hearing what mutiny there was amongſt Demetrius ſouldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing up of Antiochus Alexanders ſonne, and wrought as much as in him lay, that he would commit Antiochus to his truſt, to the intent he might make him King, and eſtabliſh him in the ſoveraign government which appertained to his father. And although upon this firſt motion of his, he could hardly be drawn to believe it; yet not long after, by the continual inſtance of Tryphon he was perſwaded to condeſcend, and ſuffer himſelf to be drawn by his perſwaſions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the high Prieſt, deſiring that they within the cittadel of Jeruſalem, and thoſe wicked and Apoſtate Jewes, and in general all thoſe that were in garriſons throughout all the countrey, might be diſplaced and diſmiſſed; he ſent Ambaſſadors with rich preſents unto Demetrius, beſeeching him to caſhiere thoſe that were in garriſon in the fortreſſes of Judea: who not onely promiſed him that demand, but alſo matters of farre greater moment, after that warre which he had then in hand, were determined. For the preſent troubles at that time, gave him no leiſure to perform the ſame: he therefore prayed him for the right of their friendſhip to ſend him ſome of his forces, giving him to underſtand, that his army was revolted. Whereupon Jonathan chooſe out three thouſand fighting men, and ſent them unto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both becauſe of the injuries they had endured under him, as alſo for the hatred they had conceived againſt his father, who had in like manner done them much wrong; ſo that they onely expected and watched their opportunity to expulſe him. Underſtanding therefore that the ſuccours that Jonathan ſent unto Demetrius were at hand; and foreſeeing that in ſhort time he would gather a great army, if they haſted not themſelves to prevent him betime; they betook them to their weapons, and beſet the Kings Palace after the manner of a ſiege, and guarded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who ſeeing himſelf roundly beſet by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, took thoſe hired ſouldiers (with thoſe whom Jonathan had ſent him) and charged them: but he was forced to retire: and overcome by them, who were aſſembled in that place to the number of many thouſands. For which cauſe the Jews perceiving that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted upon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence darted and ſhot againſt them, without any endamagement to themſelves (by reaſon of the diſtance and height of the place where they were) notwithſtanding they gauled the people grievouſly, inſomuch as they drove them from the houſes neer adjoyning, which they incotinently ſet on fire, whereby the flame thereof was ſpread thorow the whole City; ſo that the houſes that were cloſe builded the one by the other, and for the moſt part framed of wood, were burnt down to the ground. The Antiochians perceiving that they could not remedy the fire, nor extinguiſh the ſame, betook them to flight, and the Jewes chaſing them from houſe to houſe, purſued them after an incredible manner. When the King perceived that the Citizens of Antioch ranne here and there to ſave their wives and children, and for that occaſion had given over the battel, he ſet upon them in a certain narrow ſtrait, whereas divers of them were ſlain, and all at laſt enforced to caſt down their weapons, and to yeeld themſelves to Demetrius mercy, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that ſedition. After this he rewards the Jewes with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authors of his victory. Whereupon he ſent them back to Jonathan, with no ſmall acknowledgement and teſtimony of their proweſſe and virtue. But afterwards he diſcovered his evil nature towards him, and falſified his promiſes, menacing him to make warre upon him, except he paid him thoſe tributes, which the people of the Jewes ought, and were wont to pay unto the Kings anceſtors before time. And theſe deſignes of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindred him: for he was enforced to turn thoſe forces that he had prepared againſt Jonathan, to make warre upon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus (who at that time was undes years) he ſet the diadem upon his head. All the army likewiſe that had abandoned Demetrius, for ſhortning them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open warre againſt their maſter, and under Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him and overcame him, seizing both his Elephants, and the city of Antioch. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly discomfited, fled into Cilicia. But the younger Antiochus sent Ambassadors and letters to Jonathan, calling him his ally and friend, confirming the Priesthood unto him, and allotted him the four governments annexed to Judea; and besides these, he gave him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to weare the same: he gave him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon General of his army, from the marches of Tyre as far as Egypt. Jonathan highly rejoyced at these favours of Antiochus, and sent Ambassadors both unto him and Tryphon, protesting that he was their friend and ally, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefits which he had received (notwithstanding that in his necessity he had been succoured by him) returned him evill for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

Jonathan for the favours and benefits he received at Tryphons and Antiochus hands, offereth and performeth his best indevours against Demetrius.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leave to levie a great army out of Syria and Phœnicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himself incontinently into the Cities, who received him very magnificently; yet did they not afford him any men of war. Coming from thence unto Ascalon, the Citizens in honourable aray came out to meet him with presents; whom together with the Cities of Cœlosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, and to follow Antiochus, to the end, that joyning themselves with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefs which they had oftentimes endured by his means: and which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to prosecute their revenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazeans to be of a farre contrary disposition then that which he expected; for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius; yet would they not joyn their forces, or submit the City to his government. For which cause Jonathan besieged their City, and spoiled their countrey: for with the one half of his army he begirt Gaza; and with the other half he over-ran the countrey, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazeans seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiving that no succours came unto them from Demetrius; but that their own overthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off: and that which was worse, most uncertain: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they sent messengers unto Jonathan, protesting that they would be both his friends and confederates. For, men do unwillingly take knowledg of their profit, before they have bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was most expedient for them to perform before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt after, at such time as they have been chastised. Upon this submission of theirs, Jonathan received them into favour, and took pledges of them, and sent them to Jerusalem; and from thence marched he along the Countrey as farre as Damasco. And whereas an huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as far as the city Cedasa, neer unto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to divert Jonathan from Syria, by succouring and relieving those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Jonathan went out speedily to meet with them, recommending the estate of Judea to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to be gathered thorowout all the Countrey, encamped before Bethsura, a strong Fort in Judea; and besieged it (for Demetrius being before-time seized thereof, kept Garrison therein, as before this we have declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarks and fitted his engines to assault the City, and employed all his study to surprize the same, they that were besieged waxed afraid, lest if he should take the town by force, they should lose their lives. For which cause, they sent an Herald unto Simon, requesting him that he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura with the safety of their lives and goods, and go unto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the City, and he planted a Garrison therein of their own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the mean while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, caused his army to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where he was encamped, and marched towards the plain of Azot, without any suspition that his enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Jonathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed near the mountain, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battell in the Plain. As soon as Jonathan perceived their preparation to the battell, he arranged his army as conveniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Jews upon their backs, they fearing to be enclosed, and consequently easily slain, began began to flie, ſo that all of them abandoned Ionathan except ſome few to the number of fifty at the uttermoſt, and Matthias the ſonne of Abſalom, and Judas the ſonne of Chapſeus, the Chieftains of the army; who boldly entred, and like deſperate men charged the enemy in the vantguard with ſuch furie, that they made them amazed at their valour and force of handy blows, and compelled them to truſt to their heels. Which when they that fled from Ionathan perceived, they rallied themſelves and began to purſue them as farre as Cedaſa, where the enemies were encamped,

Now when Ionathan had obtained this famous victory, wherein there died about ſome two thouſand of the enemy, he returned to Jeruſalem, and (ſeeing that by Gods providence all things fell out according as he himſelf deſired) he ſent Embaſſadours unto Rome, purpoſely to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt them, and the people of the Iews: commanding his Embaſſadours upon their return from Rome, to tranſport themſelves to Sparta, and renew their common friendſhip and acquaintance alſo in that place. As ſoon as they were come to Rome, and had preſented themselves before the Senate, they declared how they were ſent from the high Prieſt Ionathan, who required the renovation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amity of the Iews, and gave them their Letters of recommendation to bear unto all the Kings of Aſia and Europe, and to the Governours of all the Cities, commanding them to grant them free paſſage to return into their Countrey. And in their return they paſſed by the Lacedemonians, and preſented thoſe Letters which Ionathan had written unto them, the copy whereof contained matters to this effect: Jonathan the high Prieſt of the Nation of the Iews, and all the commonalty of the Iews; To the Ephores, Senate and people of Sparta, Health. "If "you be in health, and both your particular and publike affairs have their deſired ſucceſs we "have that which we deſire, for our ſelves are in good diſpoſition. For as much as hereto- "fore we have received a Letter by the hands of Demoteles, written from Arius your King to "Onias our high Prieſt, making mention of that acquaintance and alliance, which is between "you and us (the copy whereof we have here under inſerted) and have received your Letters "with great content, and have with all kindly acceptance required both Demoteles and Arius "(notwithſtanding we were not ignorant of this conſanguinity long before, for that we were "inſtructed therein by our ſacred Scriptures:) And whereas we have not firſt of all acknow- "ledged you for our kinſmen, it was to no other end but for fear we ſhould raviſh the honour "of ratyfying the friendſhip between us, which we intended alwaies ſhould be yours. Since "which time wherein we have contracted friendſhip with you; we have on our holy and ſo- "lemne dayes ſacrificed unto our God, beſeeching him to continue and keep you in proſpe- "rity, and on the other ſide, in as much as we have been environed with many warres, cauſed "by the diſordered deſires of our neighbours, we have neither thought it meet to be trouble- "ſome unto you, or to any other whatſoever. But now at this time, ſince we have obtained an "happie iſſue of all theſe troubles we have ſent Numenius the ſon of Antimachus, and Anti- "pater the ſon of Jaſon, men honourable amongſt our counſellers, both to the Romans and "to you alſo; to whom we have given our Letters to be preſented unto you, in our behalf, "to the end they might renew the amity which is between you and us: you ſhall therefore "do well if you write back unto us, and certifie us wherein we may ſtead you, in that we "have ever had an earneſt deſire and will to continue our love towards you, or ought elſe "what concerneth your welfare. Theſe Embaſſadours of his were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publick ordinance as touching their aſſociation, and amity with the Jews; which they delivered unto them.

In this time were there three Sects among the Jews, who had different and contrary opinions as touching humane affairs: the firſt was that of the Phariſees, the ſecond of the Sadduces, and the third of the Eſſenians. The Phariſees affirm that ſome things and not all things, are directed by deſtinie; and that ſome other things were tied to mens election, whether they would perform them or not. The Eſſenians ſaid, that deſtinie governed all things; and that nothing hapned amongſt men that was not diſpoſed thereby. The Sadduces avow that there is no deſtinie; and that humane affairs, in that deſtinie is not, cannot be governed and diſpoſed thereby: their only opinion is, that all things depend upon our own diſpoſition, ſo as in reſpect of our good deeds, we are the authors thereof; and in reſpect of our evil, they are the fruits of our irregard. But hereof have I intreated more exactly in my ſecond book of the wars of the Jews.

Three Sects of the Jews. The Phariſees. The Eſſenians. The Saduces.

Demetrius Captains deſirous to aboliſh the diſhonour of that diſcomfiture, and recover the loſs that had lately befaln them, gathered together a greater power then the former, and went out againſt Ionathan; who having intelligence of their coming, marched ſpeedily to encounter them neer unto the Plain of Amath: for he resolved to prevent their intended rode into Iudea. Encamping therefore some fifty furlongs off of the enemie, he sent out spies to discover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view known all that possibly they could, returning took certain prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the intent of the enemies was discovered unto Ionathan; which was, that they would set upon them on the sudden. But Ionathan with a provident care speedily fortified his camp, and prepared all things necessary for defence, and placed a watch or sentinell without his hoast, keeping his souldiers up in arms all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and readie, forasmuch as they must needs fight by night, to the end that they might not be surprised by the subtilties and pollicies of their enemies. But when the Captains of Demetrius understood that their intended purpose was discovered unto Ionathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsell to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practise of subtill means to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselves not to be of sufficient strength to bid Ionathan battell in the plain field; they therefore resolved to flie, and leave great fires thorow all their camp, to the end their enemies might think they were asleep: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Ionathan drew neer their camp to bid them battell, and saw it abandoned, and conjectured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but he could not overtake them, because they had already past the flood Eleutherus, and were retyred into their strong holds and places of security. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making warre on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their countrey, took great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco, and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon (his brother) marching thorowout all Iudea and Palestine as farre as Ascalon, planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition, and finally, came to Ioppe, which he took by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because he was advertised that they of Ioppe intended to surrender the city to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Ionathan had in this sort disposed all things they came to Ierusalem, and assembled the people together in the Temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walls of the Citie, and to strengthen the inclosure of the Temple that was ruinated, advising them to fortifie the same with strong towers: and besides this, he caused another wall to be builded in the midst of the City, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that means they might cut off and stop up the passages to victuall the fort He advised them likewise, to build farre stronger fortresses thorowout the countrey, then those that were already finished. Now when as the people had allowed of this his good advice, Ionathan gave order as touching all those things that concerned the building within the City, and set his brother Simon about the fortresses in the countrey. But Demetrius passing the river, came into Mesopotomia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the Citie of Babylon; that being seized thereof, he might the better provide for all the occurrences of his kingdome. For the Greeks and Macedonians, who inhabited that countrey, had sollicited him by often Embassadours to come unto them, promising him to subscribe to his authoritie, and to warre with him against Arsaces King of the Parthians. He puffed up with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resolving with himself that after he had overcome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage war with Tryphon, and easily drive him out of the kingdom of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the countrey with great affection, he levied a great army, and assayled Arsaces, but he lost the day, and himself was taken prisoner, as we have elsewhere declared.

WHen Tryphon understood that Demetrius affairs had so unfortunate an issue, he forsook Antiochus and his service; and complotted with himself how he might kill him, and make himself King. But the fear that he had of Ionathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolved first of all to deliver himself of Ionathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young King away. Having there-

Tryphon labouring to transferre Antiochus King. dome unto his own hands, & fearing Jonathans opposition, traiterously complotteth his death.

A therefore concluded with himself to kill Jonathan by some stratagem of treason, he came from Antioch to Bethsan (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meet him with fourty thousand chosen men, supposing that Tryphon resorted thither to make war upon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with so much strength, wrought him by presents and counterfeit courtesies; commanding his Captains to obey Jonathan, thinking by that means to perswade him that he entirely and truly loved him, and to extinguish his suspition, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at such time as he had least suspition of him. He counselled him to dismiss his armie likewise, because having cut off all occasion of war, he had no reason to retain them, for that there was no suspicion of alteration. After this he invited Jonathan to come to Ptolemais, & to bring with him some few of his souldiers, signifying unto him that he would deliver the Citie into his hands, and resign all
B the fortresses that were in the countrey to his possession; urging further, that he came into that countrey to no other end, but to perform it. Jonathan suspecting no sinister dealing, and believing that Tryphon spake of good and entire affection, discharged his forces, and took only three thousand men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, and with one thousand repaired to Ptolemais unto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans shutting the gates as soon as he was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) took Jonathan prisoner, and slew all those that attended upon him. He presently sent part of his armie unto the two thousand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the sword: but they having notice of that which had befaln their Chieftain, taking up their arms, speedily departed out of Ga-
C lilee. And although the souldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in number, yet were they not so hardie as to trie whether part were the stronger; because they knew that the Jews were ready to expose themselves to all dangers, to defend their lives: and so they returned back to him that sent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The people maketh Simon General of their army, and declareth him the high Priest.

D THey of Jerusalem understanding of the surprizal of Jonathan, and the loss of his souldiers, grievously lamented for this accident, that so great a man as he was, was taken from them, in that they feared (and that not without cause) that being destitute after his decease both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them, would seek their trouble and molestation: who having held themselves quiet in admiration of him, would at that time lift themselves up against them; and not only persecute them with war, but bring them into extreme danger of their lives. Neither did their expectation deceive them. For the neighbouring nations, understanding of Jonathans death, began presently to make war upon the Jews on all sides, as against those who had no longer any Chief-
E tain under whose conduct they might wage war and shew themselves valiant. And Tryphon likewise having gathered forces, was determined to ascend into Iudæa, to war against the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiving that the Citizens of Jerusalem was dismaied with the fear, which they apprehended of those rumours and new tumults of war, and being desirous to animate them against all incursions and attempts intended by Tryphon, assembled the people in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this manner: "You are not ig"norant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, have voluntarily offered
"our selves unto death for your liberty. Since therefore, I have abundance of such like ex"amples, and that it is the ordinary course of our family to die for our Law and Religion,
"there is no fear so great as can pluck out this resolution out of my heart, as it may plant
"such a desire of life in me, as to be drawn to forget all honour. Wherefore since you have F "such a Chieftain and Commander, as seeketh light by all danger, whereby he may endure

"place soever I shall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, "whereby I should spare my life, neither am I less then they, whereby I should through "negligence and cowardize shun and forsake that which they have esteemed to be honou"rable, as is to die for the law and the service of our God. I will make manifest therefore by "all the testimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawful brother; for I trust in God,
"that he will give me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliver not only all of "you, but your wives and your children from the injury which they intended against you;
"and by the grace of God I will preserve the holy Temple, that it may not be ruinated by "their prophane hands. For, I already perceive, that the prophane nations set us at nought,

"and contemn you as if you had no Chieftain: and I know already that they are marching G
"forward to fight with you. By these words Simon heartned the people, who were distracted with fear, so that they revived their spirits and conceived better hope. Whereupon all of them cried with a loud voice, that Simon was their General, and that he was to succeed his two valiant brethren Judas and Jonathan in the Government; and that as touching themselves, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. He therefore assembled in one instant all the men at arms in that Countrey, and hasted himself to repair the City walls, defencing them with high and strong towers, and sent a certain friend of his called Jonathan the son of Absalon, with an army to Joppe; commanding him to expulse the inhabitants of that citie from thence, for that he feared lest they should submit themselves to Tryphon: As for himself, he remained in Ierusalem to secure the same.

Simon succeedeth his brothers Judas and Jonathan.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great armie, came into Iudæa, leading his pri- H soner Ionathan with him. Whereupon Simon and his army went out against him as far as Addida (a citie scituate upon a mountain, at the foot wherof beginneth the Champain countrey of Iudæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Governour of the Iews, sent messengers unto him, intending to circumvent him by treason and policy; giving him to understand that if he were desirous of his brothers enlargement, he should send him one hundreth talents of silver, and two of Jonathans children for hostages, to assure him, that being set at libertie, he should not withdraw Iudæa from the obedience of the King. (For, till that present he was held and kept prisoner, by reason of the money which he ought the King.) Simon was no ways ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he should both lose his money, if he should deliver the same, and that his brother should not be enlar- I ged, no, though his children were delivered for hostages: on the otherside he feared, lest the people should conceive sinesterly of him, as if he had been the cause of his brothers death, both by not delivering the money, neither yet the children: Having therefore assembled the armie, he declared unto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole scope of his actions were nought else but traiterous stratagems and subtilties: yet notwithstanding he told them, that he had rather send both the money and the children to Tryphon, then by refusing his conditions and demands, to be accused to have neglected the life of his brother. Simon sent therefore both the money and children of Jonathan: but Tryphon having received both, kept not his promise; but detained Jonathan: and leading his army thorow the countrey, intended to pass by Idumæa to repair to Ierusalem. He came therefore to K Dora, a citie in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping always right overagainst him. They that were in the Castle of Jerusalem, hearing news hereof, sent Tryphon word that he shou'd hasten and come unto them, and send them munition: whereupon he addressed his horsmen, pretending that very night to ride unto Ierusalem; but the snow about that time fell in such abundance, that it covered the way in such sort and was so thick, as the horses could not travel; which hindered his repair to Ierusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Cœlosyria, and speedily invading the countrey of Galaad, he put Jonathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon sent unto Basca and transported his brothers bones, L and interred them in his countrey Modin in his fathers sepulchre, and all the people mourned and lamented for him many days. Simon also builded a great monument of white and polished marble for his father and his brethren, and raised it to a great height, and garnished it round about with galleries and pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable work to behold. Besides that, he erected seven Pyramids for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, so great and so fair, as they moved admiration in those that beheld them; and are as yet to be seen at this present day. So great was Simons care, that Jonathan and the rest of his family should be honoured with so magnificent a sepulchre: which Jonathan died after he had exercised the place of the high Priest, and possessed the Government for four years. M

As soon as Simon had taken possession of the high Priesthood, by the election of the people; the very first year of his Government, he acquitted the people of the tribute which they were woont to pay to the Macedonians. This libertie and exemption from tribute happened amongst the Jews, one hundreth and seventie years since the time that Seleucus sir-named Nicanor obtained the kingdom of Syria. And in so great honour was Simon amongst the people, that in their private contracts and publick letters, the date began from the first year of Simon the benefactor and Governour of the Jewish nation. For they prospered greatly under his government, and had the victory of all their neighbouring enemies round about them. Simon beſiegeth Tryphon within Dora, and contracteth alliance with Antiochus, ſurnamed the Devout.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. 1 Mach. 15.

NOt long after the captivity of Demetrius, Tryphon ſlew Alexander the ſon of Antiochus ſurnamed God, notwithſtanding he had the care and charge of his education for four years, during which time he reigned; and ſpreading abroad a certain noiſe and C rumour, that the young King in exerciſing himſelf fortuned to die, he ſent his friends and familiars unto the men of war, promiſing them that if they would elect and chooſe him King he would give them a huge ſum of money; giving them to underſtand, that Demetrius was a priſoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother ſhould obtain the Kingdom he would puniſh them divers waies, and revenge their revolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forſaking him. The Army hoping that if they beſtowed the Kingdom on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaimed him King. But after he had attained the fulneſſe of his deſires, he ſhewed how malicious and wicked his nature was. For at ſuch time as he was a private man, he flattered the people and made ſhew of moderation; and by ſuch allurements he drew them to do what him liſted: but after he had taken D poſſeſſion of the kingdome, he diſcovered his hypocriſie, and ſhewed plainly that he was not unaptly called Tryphon, that is to ſay, a trifler or mocker. By which means he drew the hearts of the better ſort from him: and as for his army, they grew ſo much in hatred of him, that they ſubmitted themſelves to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time ſhut up both her ſelf and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus ſurnamed the Devout, and brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any City that would entertain him for fear of Tryphon; Cleopatra ſent unto him, inviting him both to be her husband, and to take the poſſeſſion of the Kingdome. And hereunto did ſhe the rather draw him, partly for that ſhe was thereunto perſwaded by her friends, and partly for the fear ſhe had, leſt ſome one of Seleucia ſhould betray the City to Tryphon. As ſoon as Antiochus was arrived in Seleu- E cia, and that from day to day his forces increaſed, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and overcame him in battel, and drove him out of the higher Syria, and purſued him as far as Phœnicia: where after he had retired himſelf into Dora, a ſtrong and impregnable Caſtle, he beſieged him therein, and ſent Ambaſſadours to Simon the High Prieſt of the Jews, to confirm a friendſhip and confederacy with him. Simon very courteouſly accepted his demands, and preſently ſent Antiochus both money and victuals, ſufficient to furniſh his army at the ſiege of Dora; ſo that in ſhort ſpace he was accepted amongſt the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place beſieged, taken and ſlain, after he had reigned three years.

Dagon: but Hyrcanus was made high Priest in his fathers stead: who after he had recommended himself to God by the firstling sacrifices that he offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make warre upon him. Now when he was fully addressed to besiege the place whither Ptolomey was retyred, he had the vantage in all other things; but onely by the affection that he bare unto his mother and his brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomey having taken them, and whipt them upon the walls in all mens presence, threatned Hyrcanus that unlesse he levied his siege, he would cast them down headlong from the top of the Castle: now whereas one way Hyrcanus had a great desire to enforce and surprize the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, through the desire that he had to redeeme those whom he loved, from the enemies tyranny. L
True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake he would not give over valiantly to assault the place; but that he should be the more encouraged to surprize the fortresse, and to lay hold upon his enemie, and be revenged on the wrong that was offered unto his dearest friends: alleadging that she thought it better to die in the the middest of a thousand torments, then that the enemy should escape unpunished, who had been so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hyrcanus heard his mother speak thus, he was more furiously incensed to give the assault; but as soon as he saw his mother so beaten and sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and the fervent desire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was presently allayed and cooled; and so the pitiful compassion of his mother, surmounted and overcame his ireful affection of re- M venge. Whilest thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the year of repose celebrated amongst the Jewes was come: For they observed the seventh year, as the seventh day is observed in the week; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was delivered of this siege, who afterwards slew both Hyrcanus mother and brethren; which done he fled unto Zeno surnamed Cotyla, who at that time tyrannized in the City of the Philadelphians.

Antiochus the Devout maketh war against Hyrcanus, and upon the receit of three hundred talents, contracteth alliance with him.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 12.

Antiochus calling to minde the manifold losses he had received by Simons meanes, invaded Jewry in the fourth year of his reign, and in the first of Hyrcanus government, which was in the hundred sixty and two Olympiade. And after he had spoiled all the countrey, he locked up Hyrcanus within the City of Jerusalem, which he had besieged with seven camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the walls, as in respect of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his Campe; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of rain, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of April. On the North side also where there is a great plain, Antiochus caused one hundred towers to be erected every one three stages high, on which he planted certain companies of armed souldiers, who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the meanes of a double and deep trench; took from them all their commodities. They on the other side made often sallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the enemy on the sudden, they made a great slaughter: but if they were discovered, they retyred souldier-like. But Hyrcanus considering the great number of people that were in the City, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any service, he devided those that were unfit for warre, and sent them out of the City, retaining onely those with him, who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; so that wandring here and there between the walls and the campe, they were consumed with famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affairs, they that were within had compassion of their countreymen, & drew them within the walls, and entertained them within the City. At this time Hyrcanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seven dayes, by reason of the solemnity of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare unto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Jerusalem of Buls with gilded horns, and vessels full of divers odors, with other vessels of gold and silver. Those that had the charge of the gates, received the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the Temple. Antiochus himself also gave the souldiers certain meats to grace their feastival, shewing himself herein to be of a far better disposition then Antiochus Epiphanes, who after he had taken the City, caused swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the Altar, and be sprinkled the Temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the Law of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled and conceived a deadly hatred against him: But Antiochus of whom we spake at this present, was by all men called Devout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the service of God.

Hyrcanus acknowledging the bountie and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Ambassadours unto him requiring him that he would permit them to use the ancient policy of their forefathers. Whereupon the King sequestring all those far off from his company, who counselled him to destroy the Jewish nation, who lived apart and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckoning of their words. And understanding that all the conversation of the Jewes was conformable unto piety, he answered the Ambassadours, that if the besieged would yeeld up their armes and pay the tributes of Joppe, and the other Cities that were out of Judea, and would receive a garrison, such as he should appoint; he would discharge them of this warre. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receive a garrison, lest they should be enforced to entertain such with whom they could not converse; but instead of the garrison they gave pledges, and payed five hundred talents of silver, of which the King received three hundred in hand, with the pledges; amongst which was Hyrcanus brother: and after he had beaten down the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence; he raised the siege and departed. But Pyrcanus opening Davids monument (who surpassed all other Kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same; whereby he took occasion first of all among the Jewes to entertain a forraign army. There was also a friendship and confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the City with all his army, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same; And that which is more, Antiochus having enterprized an exploit against the Parthians, Hyrcanus marched also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witnesse hereof, writing after this manner, in his history:

Hecdio & Rufinus, chap. 16. Hyrcanus surprizeth divers cities of Syria, and layeth desolate the Temple that was builded on the hill Garizim.

Hyrcanus hearing newes of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to find them disfurnished both of garrisons and means of defence, as in effect it came to passe. He therefore took the City of Medaba at the end of six moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards he seized Samega, and the Cities there about: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the module of the Temple of Jerusalem (which Alexander the Great permitted Sanaballath to build in favour of his sonne in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Jaddus, as we have heretofore declared) which Temple was layed desolate two hundred years after it was builded. Hyrcanus also took certain fortresses and cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, under this condition, that they should consent to be circumcised, and to live according to the lawes and religion of the Jewes. They through the desire they had to live in the place where they were born, submitted themselves to be circumcised, and to live according to the customes and ordinances of the Jewes; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Jewes. Whilest thus Hyrcanus was high Priest, he thought good to renew the amity betwixt the Jews and the Romans; and to this effect he sent an Ambassage with letters unto the Senate. As soon as the Senate had received his letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing: Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the sonne of Dositheus, Apollonius the sonne of Alexander, Diodorus the sonne of Jason, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Ambassadours by the people of the Jewes, have proposed; who have dealt with us as touching the confederation & amity that this nation had with the Romans, and have likewise conferred as touching the affairs of estate, namely, that Joppe and the Ports thereof, Gazara and the fountains thereunto belongiug, and those other Cities of the Countrey, which Antiochus took from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, should be restored unto them; and that it may not be lawful for the Kings souldiers to passe thorow their countrey, neither any of those Provinces that are under their government: and that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this war, contrary to the arrest and decree of the Senate, should be declared void, to the end that the Ambassadours sent in the Senates behalf, may provide for the restitution of those things, which Antiochus hath spoiled them of, and may rate and set down the damages, which the countrey hath received by this war. Item, that commendatory letters should be written in the behalf of the Jewish Ambassadours, to the Kings and free people for their secure and safe return into their countrey. It hath been held convenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation with men of so good respect, sent unto them by a nation so good and faithful towards them. And as touching the letters, the answer was; that they should be written at such time as the affairs of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would have care that no injury should be offered them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded also to deliver the Ambassadours money out of the common purse, to bear their charges home into their countrey: and thus did Fanius dismisse the Ambassadours of the Jewes, after he had given them silver out of the common treasurie, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should conduct them, and give them assured convoy to return into their countrey. And this was the estate of the affairs during Hyrcanus Priesthood. L M

But

A But King Demetrius being ſharply whetted to make warre againſt Hircanus, could have neither time nor occaſion to exploit the ſame, by reaſon that both the Syrians and his men of warre were ſcarcely well affected toward him, becauſe of his wickedneſs of life. For they ſent Embaſſadours to Ptolomey, ſirnamed Phyſcon, to require him to ſend ſome one of Seleucus race unto them, to take upon him the kingdome. Whereupon Ptolomey ſent them Alexander ſirnamed Zebina, accompanied with an Army; who waging battel with Demetrius, put him to the worſt, and conſtrained him to flie to his wife Cleopatra to Ptolomais: who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was conſtrained to retire himſelf from thence unto Tyre; where he was taken, and after he had ſuffered many miſeries by the hands of his enemies, he finally died. Alexander having by this means obtained the kingdom, made a league B of amitie with Hircanus. And whereas it ſo fell out, that Antiochus ſirnamed Gryphus, the ſon of Demetrius made warre againſt him, he was overcome and ſlain in the battell. When as therefore Antiochus had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Syria, he forbare to make war againſt the Iews, for that he had intelligence that his brother by the mothers ſide (who was in like ſort named Antiochus) aſſembled an army againſt him at Cyzicus. Remaining therefore in his Countrey, he reſolved to make preparation againſt his brothers coming, who was called Cyzicenus, becauſe he was brought up in that Citie, and was the ſon of Antiochus called the Conſerver, who died in the countrey of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus: and it ſo fell out, that both theſe brothers were married to one and the ſame Cleopatra, as we have heretofore expreſſed. When Antiochus the Cyzicenian was arrived in Syria, he made warre againſt his brother, which continued many yeers; C during all which time Hircanus lived in peace (for preſently after Antiochus death, he revolted from the ſubjection of the Macedonians) and from that day forward gave them no ſuccours, neither as ſubject, neither as friend; but his fortunes both augmented and flouriſhed greatly during the time of Alexander Zebina; and principally during the reign of theſe two brothers. For the war wherein they conſumed one another, gave Hircanus an opportunitie, to levie all the revenews of Judæa, without any contradiction: ſo that by the ſame means he gathered infinite ſums of money. For whileſt the Cyzicenian deſtroyed his brothers countrey, Hircanus alſo made known his inclination and diſpoſition: and ſeeing likewiſe that Antiochus was deſtitute of thoſe ſuccours expected out of Egypt, and that both himſelf and his D brother alſo (through the naturall diſcords) weakned one anothers eſtates, he ſet as light by the one as by the other.

CHAP. XVIII.

How Antiochus the Cyzicenian came to the relief of the Samaritans: and how being conquered, he fled away.

FOr which cauſe he drew forth his army againſt Samaria (which was a ſtrong city) and is at this day called Sebaſta, becauſe it was reedified by Herod, as we will make manifeſt in time and place convenient. He therefore began to beſiege E and batter the ſame with all diligence; animated thereunto, becauſe of the extreame hate he bare the Samaritans in that onely to pleaſe the Kings of Syria they had offered many grievous outrages to the Mariſſens, who were extracted from, and allied with the Iews. He therefore made a trench round about the City, with a double wall of eighty ſtounds, and committed the generall command of this ſiege to his ſonnes Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſo diligently and valiantly behaved themſelves: that the Samaritanes being overpreſſed with extream famine, were conſtrained to eat ſuch things as were unuſuall and unaccuſtomed amongſt men; and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenian to their reſcous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulſed Ariſtobulus ſouldiers, and being purſued by the F two brethren as farre as Scythopolis, he hardly eſcaped; and they returning to their ſiege, freſhly aſſaulted and beſieged the Samaritans within their own wals: So that once more they were conſtrained to ſend Ambaſſadours to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie; who ſent unto Ptolomey Lathyrus for about ſome ſix thouſand men of warre, who furniſhed him with them contrary to his mothers minde, who therefore had almoſt thruſt him out of his dominion. As ſoon as he had received them, he made a road into Hircanus countrey and ſpoiled and forraged the ſame as farre as Egypt. For he durſt not bid him battell hand to hand, becauſe he had not competent forces; but thought that in ſpoiling the countrey he might cauſe them to levy the ſiege, and forſake Samaria: but after he had loſt a great number of his men by divers ambuſcadoes of his enemies, he went unto Tripoly, committing

City for the ſpace of one whole year, he became maſter of the ſame: and not contenting himſelf with the ſurprizall hereof, he utterly deſtroyed it, enforcing the rivers thorow the midſt thereof; yea he ruined the ſame in ſuch ſort, that the mud and ſoil both of the water and earth tooke away all the appearance of the City; ſo that it ſeemed as if it had never been. Of this Hircanus there is a certain incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his high Prieſthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the H very ſame day wherein his ſons fought againſt Antiochus the Cyzicenian, whileſt being himſelf alone, he offered incenſe in the Temple, that he heard a voice ſaying, that his two ſons had at that preſent overcome Antiochus: all which he incontinently ſignified unto the people at the gate of the Temple; and according as he had ſaid, ſo it came to paſs. See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

Hircanus is foretold by a voice in the Temple, of his ſons victory.

About this very inſtant likewiſe, the affairs of the Jews proſpered not onely in Jeruſalem and Judæa, but alſo amongſt the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus.
For Queen Cleopatra rebelling againſt her ſonne Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias the ſons of that Onias, who had builded the Temple in Heliopolis (according to the pattern of that in Jeruſalem) her chieftains. And having committed her army unto their I hands, ſhe acted nothing without their advice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witneſ-eth, ſpeaking after this manner: Divers of thoſe who came with us, and of thoſe who had been ſent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, ſuddenly revolted to Ptolomey: Onely the Jews that were of Onias faction, remained conſtant in their dutie, becauſe the Queen made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their country-men. Thus far Strabo. This great felicity and proſperitie of Hircanus moved the Jews to conceive a hatred againſt him, and eſpecially the Phariſees oppoſed themſelves againſt him. Theſe Phariſees were one of the ſects of the Iews (whereof we have heretofore intreated) which ſect was ſo great in credit with the common people, that when they depoſed any thing, were it againſt the King or the K Prieſt, they were preſently believed, Hircanus had been one of their diſciples, and was in like ſort very much believed of them. He therefore invited them to a feaſt, and entertained them with all humanitie: and ſeeing that they were ſet upon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his mind, how that he deſired nothing more then to be juſt, and to ſquare all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themſelves taught. He therefore required them, that if they perceived that he miſtook himſelf in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redreſs the ſame.
Whereupon all of them gave teſtimony of his perfect vertue. Wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and ſuch a one as delighted in mutiny, ſaid unto him: Since you deſire to hear the truth, if ſo be you L affect the eſtimation of a good man, give over the place of Prieſthood, and content your ſelf with the government of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cauſe wherfore he ſhould forſake the Prieſthood? Becauſe (ſaith he) that we have heard ſay by our anceſtors, that your mother was a captive during the reign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithſtanding was a falſe report.) Hircanus hearing this, was ſore moved againſt him, and alſo all other of the Phariſees who were aſſiſtant in that place. Amongſt the reſt there was a certain man called Jonathan, of the order of the Sadduces (who maintain an oppoſite opinion againg the Phariſees) who was an inward and dear friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the injUrious ſpeeches that Eleazar had ſpoken by him, who told him that (as he thought) Eleazar had ſpoken theſe words by the publike conſent of the Phariſees; and that he might diſcover the ſame moſt manifeſtly, if he enquired of them what puniſhment Eleazar had deſerved for M ſpeaking after this ſort. Hircanus therefore queſtioned with the Phariſees as concerning his puniſhment, telling them that he ſhould very well perceive, that this injury had not been pronounced by the common conſent of them all, if they condemned the offender to ſuffer a puniſhment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, that he ought to be puniſhed by impriſonment and ſcourging, for (ſaid they) an injury done in word, required no capitall puniſhment: and to ſpeak uprightly, they in their thinking cenſured ſeverely enough of this fault, for that the Phariſees are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any queſtion of puniſhment. But Hircanus was ſore offended with this their anſwer, and Hircanus groweth in diſcontent with the Phariſees.

The Sadducee Jonathan incenſeth Hircanus againſt the Phariſees.

A imagined that this Eleazar had ſpoken after this maner by the common inſtigation of the reſt. This diſpleaſure and conceived diſlike of his, did Jonathan aggravate to the utterm oſt, and handled the matter in ſuch ſort, that he drew Hircanus to forſake the Phariſees, and to ſubſcribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, aboliſhing their ordinances, and cauſing them to be ſharply puniſhed that obſerve the ſame. Theſe practices of Hircanus incenſed the people againſt him & his ſons. But hereof we will ſpeak in another place. At this preſent I wil declare how the Phariſes have made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the laws of Moſes: for which cauſe the Sect of the Sadduces rejecteth them, affirming that they ought to keep the written ordinances, and not to obſerve thoſe that are grounded upon the tradition of the Fathers: And great diſpute and diſſenſions have been raiſed among them upon this occaſion, becauſe the richer B ſort only, and not the baſer ſort of people, cleaved to the Sadduces: but the Phariſees had the commonalty on their ſides. But of theſe two ſorts, & of the Eſſeans, I have more exactly entreated in my ſecond book of the wars of the Jews. But Hircanus finally appeaſed this mutinie, and lived afterwards in much peace and happineſs, and after he had moſt diſcreetly governed his Princedom for the ſpace of one and thirtie years, he died; leaving five ſons behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts; the gift of government, the gift of Prieſthood, and the gift of Prophecy. For God ſpake unto him divers times by Oracles, and Revelations, and gave him the knowledg of things to come; which he in ſuch ſort foretold, that he declared that his two eldeſt ſons ſhould not poſſeſs the principality any C long time: whoſe end it ſhall not be amiſs to ſet down in what manner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may be the better known.

CHAP. XIX.

Ariſtobulus obtaineth the government, and firſt of all placeth the Kingly Diadem on his head.

D AFter the death of their father, Ariſtobulus the eldeſt of his ſons determined to exchange the Principality into an abſolute eſtate of a Kingdome, and the better to attain thereunto, he firſt of all ſet the Diadem upon his head, four hundreth eighty and one years and three moneths ſince the people of the Jews were delivered from the ſervitude of Babylon, and led again into their countrey. And for that Ariſtobulus among all his other brethren, loved Antigonus beſt of all, who was the neareſt unto him in age; he accepted him as a companion in the government of the Kingdome: but as touching the reſt, he ſhut them up in priſon. He lockt up his mother likewiſe, who had contended with him as concerning the government (for that Hircanus had committed all things E to her diſpoſition) and ſo far extended his cruelty, that he famiſhed her to death in priſon. After he had thus handled his mother, he ſlew his brother Antigonus alſo; whom he pretended to love above all the reſt, and whom (as he made ſhew) he had made partner of his kingdom. From whom he eſtranged himſelf, by reaſon of ſome ſlanders and falſe accuſations raiſed up againſt him; which at the firſt he gave no credit to, both for that the friendſhip which he bare unto him, made him ſlightly reſpect the ſame, as alſo for that he imagined that he was enviouſly ſlandered. It came to paſs that Antigonus, returning upon a certain time from the army with great magnificence, about the time of the feaſt of Tabernacles, chanced to repair thither at that very time, wherein Ariſtobulus hapned to fall ſick. Antigonus intending to celebrate the ſolemnity, aſcended the Temple in great bravery, attended by ſome of his army, to make his ſpecial prayers for his brothers health. Whereupon certain F malicious wretches, deſirous to break the concord that was between them, made uſe of this occaſion, and of Antigonus magnificent pomp and good fortune; and came unto the King, amplifying unto him in malicious words, what pomp and majeſtie he had ſhewed in that ſolemnity, telling him that in theſe his actions, he demeaned himſelf in no ſort like a private man; but that all his actions were levelled at a royaltie: finally, that his intent was to enter the Kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that he made his account that ſince he might be King alone, it was a great ſimplicity for him to have a companion. But Ariſtobulus, although he would very hardly be induced to believe theſe reports; yet notwithſtanding being deſirous both to extinguiſh the ſuſpicion, and to provide for his own ſecurity, he diſpoſed certain of his guard in a dark and privie place under ground, and lodged himſelf in a certain tower called Antonia, commanding that no man ſhould offer violence, except thoſe who entred armed: Giving a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, he should be slain. Which done, he sent for his brother, willing him to repair unto him without weapons. Which when the Queen and they that complotted the murther of Antigonus understood, they perswaded the messenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that he made war-like preparation and furniture for war) that in that estate and pomp, and in those royal and war-like accoutrements, he should come and visit him, to the end he might be an eye-witness of his brave furniture and preparation. But Antigonus suspecting no harm intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foot toward Aristobulus, to shew himself in that bravery: and when he came right over against the tower, that is called Straton, where the passage was very dark, the Kings guard slew him.

By this accident a man may easily conjecture, that there is scarcely any power greater then that of envy and slander, and that there is not any thing that may sooner break off the good will and amitie amongst brethren, then these two passions. And above all, there is an occasion offered us of great wonder, in respect of one that was called Judas, of the Sect of the Essens, who in all those things that he prophecied, varied in no sort from the truth. He seeing Antigonus come up into the Temple, cried out among his disciples (who frequented with him to be instructed by him in the method of prophecy) that he was weary of his his life, because Antigonus securitie argued the vanitie of his prophecie, by which he had foretold, that that very day he should be slain at Stratons tower, whereas the place where he should be murthered, was six hundred stounds off, and the better part of the day was already spent: so that it could not be imagined, but that he should be in danger to have made a false prediction. Whilest he declared his doubts after this manner, and was wholly overcome with choler, news was brought that Antigonus was slain in a certain place under ground, which was called the tower of Straton, of the same name with that other that standeth near the Sea, which was afterwards called Cæsarea; which ambiguitie troubled the Diviner. Incontinently after this accident, Aristobulus repented himself, in that he had put his brother to death; and this repentance of his, was seconded by a most grievous sickness, proceeding from the affliction of his spirit and detestation of that cruel murther: so that with grievous agonie and torment he vomited bloud, as if all his entrals had been torn in sunder. This bloud so vomited by him, it fortuned (in mine opinion) by the divine providence of God, that a certain servant of his bearing it from his presence, by some trip of his foot hapned to stumble, and shed the same in that very place, which had been soiled with the bloud of the slaughtered Antigonus. By which means they that beheld the same, raised a great cry, exclaiming that the Page had shed the bloud in a convenient place. Aristobulus hearing this out-cry, demanded the cause thereof, and for that no man addressed himself to satisfie him, he was the more earnest to know it (according to the nature of men, who are always more suspicious and desirous to know those things, which are most concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and never a man for fear of him durst tell him the truth. Whereupon he altogether dismaied and affrighted in his conscience, casting forth a bundant tears, and loaden with grievous sighes, began to cry out in this manner: How then? Mine impious and detestable act is not hidden from God, but the sudden punishment of my brothers murther pursueth me: wherefore, O thou shamelesse body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my soul, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghosts of my mother and bother? Why doest thou not take it all at once such as it is, without expecting that I should sacrifice my bloud, poured out so many times to those, whom I have so traiterously slain? While he pronounced these words, he died, after he had reigned one year. He was called Philelles, that is to say, a lover of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his countrey many ways, and subdued the Iturœans, and joyned the greater part of the countrey, to Judæa; and had constrained them likewise, who should remain in that countrey, to be circumcised, and to live according to the laws of the Jews, he died thus miserably. He was by nature courteous and shamefast, as Strabo testifieth, speaking after this manner, by the authoritie of Timagines; This was a courteous man, and profitable to his countrey-men the Jews in many things: for he enlarged their countrey, and conquered a part of the nations of the Iturœans, whom he tied unto him by the bond of circumcision.

The exploits of Alexander King of the Jews.

The yeer of the world, 3863. before Christs nativity. 101.

WHen Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) set his brothers at libertie (whom, as we have heretofore declared, he had shut up prisoners) and made Jannæus (who was called Alexander) King; who both in age and modestie surpassed all the other brethren; but such mis-hap had he, that from his birth-day upward, his father had conceived so great a hate against him, that he never admitted him to his presence so long as he lived. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loved Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sons, with most intire affection, God appeared unto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Whereupon God presented unto his sight the semblance of Alexander, wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceived he should be heir of all his goods; and so much prevailed displeasure with him, that as soon as he was born, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee to be nourished and brought up in that place. But God hath apparantly proved that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the Kingdom, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himself King: and as for the other, who resolved himself to live in idleness and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 19. Salome surnamed Alexandra Aristobulus his wife maketh Iannæus Alexander King.

Alexander executeth the one brother that affected the crown, and honoureth the other.

After that he had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, he led forth his Army against Ptolemais: and having obtained the upper hand in the battell, he couped up the men within their citie, and afterwards besieged and intrenched about the same. For amongst all the cities of the sea-coast, these two onely, namely Ptolemais and Gaza remained as yet unconquered, and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seized of the Tower of Straton and Dora where he governed. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizenus were thus at debate and war the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were travelled with this siege, Zoilus (who held the tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army he had under him, and gave them some succours, by reason that (since these two Kings were whetted with intestine troubles and wars) he cast how to advance himself to the crown and soveraigntie. For these two Kings seemed to neglect their own dangers, resembling herein those wrasthers, who though being wearied with fight; yet are ashamed to submit unto their adversary, but give themselves a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had, were in the Kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Ile of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himself after he had been driven out of his kingdom by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolemaidans sent Embassadours as unto their allie, requiring him to come and deliver them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadours perswaded him, that if he would pass into Syria, he should have both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolemaidans: and moreover, they assured him that the Sidonians and divers others would second him: and by this means so encouraged him with promises, that he hasted himself to set saile.

Zoilus tyrant of Straton and Dora.

But in the mean space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authority with the Citizens) made the Ptolemaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazard themselves in some uncertain danger, wherewith the Iews threatned them, then to deliver themselves into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest servitude. And moreover, not onely to sustain a present warre; but that which is more, an imminent war from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should levie an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce her self also to thrust her sonne out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more return again to Cyprus; whereas they were to expect no less but extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey being at sea, understood how the Ptolemaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolemais; and perceiving that upon his encamping, they of the citie admitted not his Embassadours, neither in any sort gave eare unto them, he was wonderously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come unto him, requiring him to yield their assistance, for that their countrey was destroyed by the Iews, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolemais, for fear of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his own countrey, he began to use this stratagem. For covertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly he made a shew of amitie and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to give him foure hundreth talents of silver, provided that he would deliver him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assign those possessions held by him unto the Jews. Ptolomey having made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he understood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went and besieged Ptolemais, that would not entertain him. After therefore he had left his Lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces he departed with the rest, to enter upon and spoil the countrey of Judæa. Alexander perceiving Ptolomeys intent, assembled about 500 20. fighting men of his own countrey, (or as some Historians have written, 80000.) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who suddenly setting upon Azoch a city of Galilee on a Sabbath day, took it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantitie of other booty.

Ptolomey assaulteth Sephor. Hecatontamachi, or the warriors by hundreths.

HE afterwards set upon Sephor a Citie near unto Azoch, from whence he departed with the loss of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him near unto Jordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right over against the enemy. He had in his vantguard 8000. men, whom he called combatants by the hundreths, who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomeys foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiving themselves to be inferiours in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazard battell. But Philostephanus the Camp-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to pass the flood, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the river on their backs, he should be the more assured of them; that they should not warrantize themselves from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiving that Alexanders army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselves. The wing of the Iews vantguard that saw themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so farre were those that marched next them, from yielding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became partners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomeys side behaved themselves far otherwise: for hey pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarrayed them, they charged them so hotly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their arms with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slain in the battell (Timagenes saith, fifty thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and othersome fled unto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, he overran and spoyled the whole countrey, and in the evening he quartered himself in certain villages of Judæa, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his souldiers without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into pieces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were sod, to eat the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battell, and retired to their own habitations, should know that their enemies would eat mans flesh; that by this means they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this manner, as I have declared. And Potolomey took Ptolemais also by force, as I have made known else where.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her son prospered, and how he had spoyled Jewry without any prejudice, and subjected the Citie of Gaza to his command: she concluded with her self, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that manner, considering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whose soveraigntie he affected. For which cause, she suddenly marched out against him, with an Army both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Jews; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Ile of Coos, with her nephews, and her testament, to be reserved and kept there in safety

And after she had commanded her sonne Alexander to set sail toward Phœnicia, with a great navy, because the inhabitants of that countrey were revolted from her obeisance: she her self departed and came to Ptolemais, and besieged it, when she perceived that they refused to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Ægypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he should finde the countrey disfurnished of men of warre. But this purpose failed him. At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatras armie, died in Cœlosyria, being in pursuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra having tydings of her sonnes enterprise, and that the successe and fortune he expected in Ægypt had failed him, she sent part of her armie to drive him out of the countrey; so that he was enforced to return back again out of Ægypt, and to go and spend his winter at Gaza.

Ptolemais besieged and taken by Cleopatra.

B Mean while Cleopatra besieged and took the citie of Ptolemais, whither Alexander resorted unto her, with great presents, and an answerable respect unto his fortune, who had been so untowardly handled by Ptolomey, having now no other recourse left him but to her favour and assistance. Upon his arrivall, certain of her familiars counselled her to lay hands on him, and to seize the countrey: and not to permit that so great a number of Jews, and they so valiant men, should become subjects unto one man. But Ananias gave her counsell to the contrary, alleadging that she should commit an act of great injustice, if she should depose him, who was her allie, from the government; who was beside that, very neerly allied unto her. For (said he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Jews a hainous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming her self according to

C Ananias counsell, resolved with her self to offer Alexander no injurie; but instead thereof, she entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a Citie of Cœlosyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that he was discharged of the fear which he had conceived in respect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Cœlosyria, and after six moneths siege, took Gadara: he took shortly after Amath also (which is a great fortresse belonging to the inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore the sonne of Zenon had hoorded up the richest and goodliest part of his substance: who surprising the Jews at unawares, slew about ten thousand of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

This did not any wayes astonish Alexander: but notwithstanding the dysaster, he marched forward toward the cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias,

D situate on the sea-coasts, and took them perforce; and seeing that Ptolomey was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Ægypt, he besieged the citie of Gaza, and spoiled all the countrey round about it, by reason of the displeasure which he had conceived against the citizens, for that they had sought their assistance at Ptolomeys hands against him. Against him Apollodotus Captain of the Gazeans made a sally by night, and entred the camp of the Jews, having onely with him two thousand strange souldiers, and one thousand of his own followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazeans had the upper hand, because that they made their enemies beleeve that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Jews afresh: but as soon as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soon as the Jews were assured of the truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the

All this notwithstanding, they bethought them on no surrender, but stood out, being neither amated with losse of men, nor lack of provision whatsoever, resolving themselves rather to endure any misery, then to submit themselves into the hands of their enemies: and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas King of Arabia, who had promised no lesse. But it came to passe that Apollodotus was slain before his arrivall, and the citie taken. Some of them likewise perceiving themselves to be alone, set fire upon their houses, taking away first that which was therein; to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their spoils. Othersome killed their wives and children with their own hands, meaning this way to deliver them from the enemies servitude. But the Senators, to the number of five hundreth, were fled into the Temple of Apollo (for at such time as the enemy entred the town, they were by chance assembled in counsell) all these did Alexander put to the sword, and instantly razed and levelled that Citie with the

About this time Antiochus, ſurnamed Gryphus, died by the treaſon of Hiracleon, in the fourty ane fifth yeer of his age, and in the nine and twentieth of his reign. His ſonne Seleucus had the Kingdome after him, who made warre againſt his uncle Antiochus, ſurnamed Cyzicenus, and having overcome and taken him, he ſlew him. Not long after, Antiochus the ſonne of Cyzicenus, and Antoninus, ſurnamed the Devout, came to Arade, and placed the Diadems upon their heads, and made warre againſt Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drave him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the citie of the Mopſeates, he exacted a ſumme of money at the citizens hands. But the people were ſo incenſed, that they ſet fire on his palace; whereby it came to paſſe, that both he and his friends were burned to duſt. During the time that Antiochus to ſonne of Cyzicenus reigned in Syria, H another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made warre againſt him; but he was not onely overcome, but both he and his army were put to the ſword. After him, Philip his ſonne took the Diadem, and governed in certain places of Syria.

Againſt theſe two brothers Antiochus made a manly and valiant reſiſtance, but died very ſhortly after. For repairing to Laodicea to ſuccour the Queen of the Galadenians, who made warre againſt the Parthians, he died fighting valiantly; and his two brothers, Demetrius and Philip poſſeſſed Syria, as hereafter ſhall be declared. As for Alexander, a domeſticall ſedition was raiſed againſt him; for the people aroſe and mutined at ſuch time, as he aſſiſted at the Altar to ſolemnize the feaſt of Tabernacles, and during the time I that he intended the ſacrifice, they caſt Citrons at him: for (as we have declared elſewhere) the Jews have this cuſtome, that on the feaſt of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palm, and of Citrons. They upbraided him alſo with many injurious ſpeeches, reproaching him, that he had been priſoner in warre; and that he was alſo unworthy of the honour of the Prieſthood. Whereupon, he being moved by theſe diſgraces, ſlaughtered about ſix thouſand men: and having made an incloſure of wood about the Temple and the Altar (as farre as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Prieſts) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained alſo certain ſtrange ſouldiers Piſidians and Cilicians. And beſides this his laſt miſhap, the people hated him, againſt whom he made warre for the ſpace of ſix yeers, and ſlew at the leaſt fiftie thouſand of them: and the more he intreated them to compromit theſe hainous debates between them, the more grievous diſpleaſure conceived they againſt him, becauſe of the inconveniences they had ſuffred: ſo that when he demanded of them what they would have him to do, they all of them with one voice cried out, that he L ſhould kill himſelf. CHAP. XXII.

Demetrius fighteth with Alexander, and hath the upper hand.

HE coming onward with his army, and taking with him thoſe who had incited him to the enterpriſe, came and encamped neer unto the citie of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together ſome twenty thouſand Jews (whom he knew to be well affected towards him) with ſix thouſand and two hundreth mercenary ſouldiers and ſtrangers, marched forward againſt Demetrius, who led with him three thouſand horſe- M men, and fourtie thouſand footmen. Both on the one and the other ſide there fell out many ſubtill ſtratagems: the one of them ſtriving on the one ſide to inveigle and withdraw the forrain ſouldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himſelf to reconcile theſe Jews that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other prevailed ought at all by theſe divices: ſo that finally they were driven to decide their quarrell by the ſword: in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand. For all the ſtrangers that were on Alexanders ſide, were every one hewed in pieces, after they had made ſufficient proof both of their faith and valour. There died alſo many of Demetrius ſouldiers.

Alexander in this fight loſeth all his hired ſouldiers.

But

A But after that Alexander had fled unto the mountains, divers Iews (to the number of six thousand) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, resorted unto him; which when the conquerer heard, he retired himself. After this the Iews made warre against Alexander, and in divers losses which they received, there died a great number of them in divers combates: Finally, after he had closed up the most strongest amongst them in the City of Bethom, he besieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his subjection, he carried them to Ierusalem, where he perpetrated an unspeakable and cruel murther. For whilest he banquetted with his concubines, in the sight of them all, he commanded eight hundreth of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eies whilest they yet lived, he caused their wives and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to revenge himself of those wrongs which he had received: but B he exceeded the bounds of humanity herein, notwithstanding they had rebelled against him, and reduced him into a most pitious estate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdome. For being not content to assail and make warre upon him with their forces, they drew strangers also in his countrey against him: and finally, they overpressed him in such sort, that he was constrained to yeeld up into the King of Arabias hands, the countries and cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear lest they should joyn with the Iews, and make warre against him; besides other innumerable injuries and outrages committed by them against him. This notwithstanding it cannot be excused, but that he overshot himself herein; so that by reason of this enormous cruelty, he was called Thra- C cidas, that is to say, as cruel as a Thracian: and this title continued amongst the Jews. The souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thousand, fled by night into strong and sure holds; and as long as Alexander lived they were in exile. But at the last, after he was delivered of all these troubles, he lived in quiet and governed his kingdome peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Judea to Berœa, besieged his brother Philip with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse. But Straton Lord of Berœa, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces governour of the Parthians, unto his help; who repairing unto him with great forces, besieged Demetrius in his own trenches, in which they so inclosed him by continuall shooting D of darts, and want of water, that they constrained him and those that were with him to submit themselves to their mercy. When as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were seized of Demetrius, they sent him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp were suffered to depart with the safety of their lives and baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates King of Parthia honoured Demetrius, by all means possible untill such time as he was surprised with a sickness, whereof he died. Incontinently after the battell, Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the kingdome, ruled over Syria.

The exploits of Antiochus Dionysius against Judea.

AFter this Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philips brother) came into Damasco to obtain the soveraignty therein, and therein in short space accomplishing his affairs, got possession of the crown. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readinesse to invade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Da- G masco with great speed, and made him surrender up the Citie, both by the means of Milesius whom Antiochus had left Governour in the Castle; as also by the consent of the citizens themselves. But Philip shewed himself ungrateful toward Milesius, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at such time as he delivered him the Citie; F because his intent was, that the world should think that the fear of his power, and not Milesius favour, was the cause of the surprisal of Damasco. Which act of his drew him into suspition with Milesius, and was the cause that he lost the Citie again. For departing from thence to exercise himself at Tilt, Milesius lockt the gates against him, and kept the citie for Antiochus. Who having intilligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very instant led his army into Iudea, in which there were eight thousand footmen, and eight hundred horsmen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep trench from Caparsabe (which is called at this day Antipatris) as farre as the sea of Ioppe (which was the onely streight whereby he might be assailed) and made a wall furnished with wooden towers, with their courts of guard, distant the one from the other an hundreth and fifty furlongs,

The King of Arabia retired upon the first assault; but afterwards he presently came into the field with ten thousand horsemen: whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onset lost his life (yet with victory) whilest he sought to succour a company of his men that were hardly laid to. After Antiochus death, his army retired to the borough of Cana, where divers of them died for hunger.

Antiochus death and the famine amongst his army.

After him Aretas reigned in Cœlosyria, who was called unto that kingdome by those that held Damasco and hated Ptolomey the sonne of Menneus. Aretas led his army into Jewry, and got a victory against Alexander neer to Adida: which done, he retired out of Iudea, upon a composition made between them. Moreover, once more Alexander marched towards the city of Dion, and took the same. And afterwards he led his army against Essa, where Zeno had hoorded up his chiefest riches: and before he assailed the fortresse, he environed the H place with three huge walls, which he builded round about it, and having taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, and Seleucia: which when he had overcome, he made himself master of the valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortresse of Gamala. And objecting many crimes against Demetrius the Lord of those places, he dispossessed him of his government. Finally, after he had made warre for the space of three whole yeers he returned into his countrey; where the Iews entertained him willingly by reason of the happy exploits which he had atchieved.

After this, King Alexander fell sick, by the means of his surfeit and drunkennesse; and for the space of three yeers he was travelled with a quartane ague. This notwithstanding, he was alwaies in the camp, untill such time as being wearied with travells, he died in the marches of the countrey of the Gerasens, at such time as he besieged Regaba (which is a castle K situate on the other side of Jordan.) The Queen perceiving that he was at deaths door, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recovery; she began to weep and lament, and to beat her brests, because both she and her children were likely now to be left desolate, and in these words she bemoaned her self unto him: "To whom wilt thou leave both me and thy "children in the estate, wherein we be? or why should we survive or live one after another "considering that thou assuredly knowest, that the hearts of thy people are estranged from "us? Hereupon the King comforted her, and gave her this counsel, that if she would assure the kingdom both unto her and her children, she should behave her self according to his direction: which was, first to conceal his death, and not to suffer his men of war to have notice L

Which done, he advised her to repair to Jerusalem in pomp, and triumph; and that being there, she should bestow some authority upon the Pharisees, who should recover her praises, and obtain her favour amongst the people. For (said he) these kind of men are in great estimation and credit with the people, and can do much hurt unto those they hate, and further them in like sort very mightily towards whom they are well affected: For the people easily believeth them, when they urge ought against any man, notwithstanding it be of envie, and that himself also had incurr'd the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them.

Alexanders death.

AFter that Alexandra had taken the Caſtle of Ragaba, ſhe conferred with the Phariſees, according to her husbands counſell, and committed unto their diſcretion, not onely that which concerned her husbands obſequies, but alſo the government B of the Kingdome: whereby ſhe not onely appeaſed the diſpleaſure which before-time they had conceived againſt Alexander, but alſo obtained their good will and amitie. They therefore came and declaimed amongſt the people, making an Oration of the acts and gefts of Alexander, complaining every where that they had loſt a good King, and by the inforced praiſes that they uſed, they incited the people to great grief and lamentation: ſo that they buried him with more magnificence, then any King that reigned before him. This Alexander left two ſonnes behinde him, the one called Hircanus, the other Ariſtobulus, and by his teſtament committed the government of the Kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to mannage affairs, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Ariſtobulus, who was the younger, was both active and fit for government. The people were well C affected towards Alexandra, becauſe ſhe had manifeſtly expreſſed how greatly ſhe miſliked her husbands miſgovernment.

Hedio & Ruffinus chap. 22. Hircanus and Ariſtobulus Alexanders ſonnes.

She appointed Hircanus high Prieſt (both in regard of his age, as alſo for that by nature he was compoſed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the diſpoſition of the Phariſees, commanding the people to obey and ſerve them. She alſo renued and confirmed that which Hircanus had diſanulled, and the Phariſees (according to the cuſtomes of their forefathers) had introduced; ſo that ſhe bare the name, and the Phariſees the authoritie royall. For they reſtored ſuch as were baniſhed, to their eſtates, and delivered priſoners; and in all things they demeaned themſelves like great Lords, Alexandra alſo for her part undertook the care of the Common-weal, and kept a great number of ſouldiers in pay, and increaſed D her power in ſuch ſort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and delivered the hoſtages and pledges of peace. All the countrey was at quiet, onely the Phariſees troubled the Queen, perſwading her to put thoſe to death, who had counſelled King Alexander to put thoſe eight hundreth to death (of whom we have ſpoken before) and they themſelves afterwards ſlew one that was called Diogenes, and after him divers others, one by one, untill ſuch time as thoſe in authority came unto the royall palace, accompanied with Ariſtobulus (who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, and who if the occaſion were offered, made ſhew that he would not permit his mother to govern after that manner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had been, to expreſſe their dutie and loyaltie which they ought to their deceaſed maſter; and how for that cauſe they had been greatly honoured by him; requiring her that ſhe would not utterly fruſtrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their ſervice, that now they that had eſcaped from the danger of their forrain enemies, were in their houſes murthered like beaſts by their private maligners, without any relief or ſuccours from any one. They furthermore urged, that if their adverſaries would content themſelves with thoſe they had ſlain, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reaſon of the ſincere affection they bare unto their Lords: but if they muſt needs as yet ſuffer the like, they required that they might have licence to depart. For that they would not procure their ſafetie, otherwiſe then by her conſent, and would rather ſuffer a voluntary death neer unto her royall palace, if they might not be ſpared: for that it would be a ſhame both for themſelves, and for the Queen, if by her toleration, thoſe, F who had been her deceaſed husbands friends, ſhould be thus vexed by them which were his adverſaries.

Hircanus high Prieſt.

Ariſtobulus & his followers accuſe the Phariſees of tyrannie.

That Aretas King of Arabia and other Princes, would be glad of this news, to hear that ſhe ſhould eſtrange thoſe perſons farre from her, whoſe names have been dreadfull even amongſt thoſe neighbouring Kings who have but heard the ſame. And if ſhe had reſolved to make more account of the Phariſees favour, then of their ſervice, they beſought her that ſhe would at leaſt-wiſe diſtribute them in ſeverall caſtles, for that rather then any miſhap ſhould purſue their ſoveraigne Alexanders houſe, they were content to lead their lives in that contemptible and abject condition. Whileſt thus they ſpake, and exclaimed on the ſoul of Alexander, praying him to have compaſſion as well of thoſe that were already dead, as of thoſe who were in danger of their lives, the tears ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus above the rest was heartily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselves were the cause of their own calamitie, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a head-strong and ambitious woman to reign over them, as if the King had no heirs reserved to succeed him in the Kingdome. The Queen uncertain how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reserving onely Hircania, Alexandrion, and Machæron, wherein the Princes moveables and wealth was kept. Not long after, she sent her sonne Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennæus, who was an ill neighbour unto that Citie: but he returned thence without atchieving any memorable action. About the same time news was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia invaded Syria, with five hundreth thousand men of warre, intending shortly to set upon Jewry. This rumor affrighted the Queen, and all the commonalty (and not without cause.) Whereupon she sent Embassadours with many princely presents unto Tigranes, who besieged the citie of Ptolemais. (For Queen Selena, otherwise called Cleopatra, reigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadours met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to receive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole nation of the Jews: who received them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so farre to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolemais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and forraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this news, returned back into his countrey. Alexandras sickneſſe, and Aristobulus attempt.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell sick of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus took occasion to intermeddle with the affairs of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trustie servant, he repaired unto those Castles, which were committed to the custodie of his fathers friends; for of long time he had misliked his mothers Government, and now was the more afraid that if she should happen to die, all her posteritie should be made subject to the power of the Pharisees. For he well perceived how unapt his elder brother was to govern the Kingdome, unto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefest Potentates commanded, who entertained him with great joy. K

Aristobulus seizeth the castles, & great concourse of people resort to him.

The next day, the Queen hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to work some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surprised by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queen and the whole nation were dismaied, fearing lest he should presently usurpe the soveraignetie; but above all they feared, lest he should revenge himself on those, who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle that adjoyned the Temple. But from all parts round about resorted there souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some fifteen dayes he took twenty and two forts, whither he made his retreats, and assembled an army of souldiers, and levied them amongst the Lords that inhabit Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude hath alwayes resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintain and roiallize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby; as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchie. Hereupon the ancient Jews and Hircanus repaired unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsell and good advice touching the present affairs, because that Aristobulus her sonne was already willnigh Lord of the whole countrey, since he had so many M forts under his command: Furthermore, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to consult without her expresse order, notwithstanding she were grievously sick, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The Queen willed them to do that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weal; telling them that they had many means, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong; and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasurie: certifying them, that because she knew that she had not long to life, she had no more reason to take care of those affairs. Anon after she had spoken thus, she died; after she had reigned nine yeers, and lived in all seventy and three yeers. This woman was adorned with greater excellence then could be expected from one

How after the contention between the two brethren touching the Kingdome, it was agreed that Ariſtobulus ſhould be King, and Hyrcanus live as a private man.

The year of the world, 3899. before Chriſts Nativity. 65.

WE have already intreated in our former Book, both of the acts, and death of Queen Alexandra: it now remaineth at this preſent to proſecute and continue the ſequel of our Hiſtory, to the end that we neither omit any thing through ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulneſſe. For they that make profeſſion to write Hiſtories, and to recite things as are obſerved by Antiquity, ought not onely ſtudiouſly to conform their ſtyle, but alſo to beautifie the ſame, with ornaments of eloqnence, to the intent the Reader may converſe in their writings with the more delectation. But above all things they muſt have an eſpecial care ſo exactly to ſet down the truth, that they, who know not how theſe things come to paſſe, may be the more duly and fitly informed. I K

The office and duty of an Hiſtoriographer.

When as therefore Hyrcanus had taken upon him the high Prieſthood, in the third yeai of the hundred ſeventy and ſeventh Olympiade, and in the year that Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenſian)were Conſuls at Rome, Ariſtobulus ſuddenly undertook the war againſt Hyrcanus, and fought with him near unto Jericho: where a great number of Hyrcanus followers ſubmitted themſelves of their own accord to Ariſtobulus. Through which accident Hyrcanus was inforced to flie to the fortreſſe of the higher City, where Alexandria Ariſtobulus mother had impriſoned both his wife and children (as before this is ſpecified.) The reſt of the faction for fear of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themſelves within the incloſure of the Temple, where they were beſieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their difference was accorded in this manner, that Hyrcanus ſhould paſſe the remnant of his life without intermedling with affairs of State, but ſhould onely intend his ſecurity and peace; and Ariſtobulus ſhould command the Kingdome. This league was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with oaths, conjunction of hands and embraces in the ſight of all the people; which being finiſhed Ariſtobulus retired himſelf into the Palace; and Hyrcanus to Ariſtobulus lodging, to lead a private and quiet life.

Hedio & Ruffinus chap. 11. Antipater the Idumæan Hyrcanus friend. Antipater of Judæa, as Nicholas Damaſcenus implies, firſt called Antipas.

BUt a certain friend of Hyrcanus (by nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being well monied, and by nature both factious and induſtrious, and through ambition but badly affected towards Ariſtobulus. the rather for that he affected Hyrcanus faction, but to ſtirre much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damaſcene writeth of this man, that he was deſcended from the nobleſt amongſt thoſe Jewes who returned from out of Babylon into Jewry: but this he did of ſet purpoſe to gratifie Herod Antipaters ſonne, who by a caſualty became afterwards King of the Jewes (as we will expreſſe hereafter in time and place convenient.) This Antipater was at the firſt called Antipas, according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made Govenour of all Idu-

A mæa by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Aſcalonites, corrupting them, and inſinuating himſelf into their favours by divers great preſents beſtowed upon them. This young Antipater conſidering with himſelf what Ariſtobulus power was, and fearing leſt ſome miſchief might befall him through the hatred the young King had conceived againſt him, he communicated with certain of the greateſt reckoning amongſt the Jews, and ſecretly and cunningly incenſed them againſt Ariſtobulus, telling them that they had done amiſs, both to ſee and ſuffer Ariſtobulus to detain the Kingdom unjuſtly in his hands, and to diſpoſſeſs his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. He likewiſe accoſted and ſounded Hircanus ordinarily with theſe words; telling him that he lived in danger of his life, and would doubtleſs be overtaken,
B except he ſought his own ſecurity, and fled his eminent perill: alledging that Ariſtobulus friends would never ceaſe to conſult how they might ſhorten his life, to the end that he might live in more ſecuritie. To theſe inſtigations of his, Hircanus gave ſmall credit (for that of his own nature he was courteous, and could not eaſily be induced or ſeduced by detractions) but this negligence and careleſneſs in him, was the cauſe that he was accounted a ſilly and abject man. On the contrary ſide, Ariſtobulus was of a diffeerent and heroick nature, being more active in performance, and carefull prevention.

Antipater inceniſeth the Princes of the Jews againſt Ariſtobulus.

Now although Antipater ſaw that Hircanus made ſmall account of his inſtigations; yet ceaſed he not dayly to invent and propoſe new ſurmizes and accuſations, urging Ariſtobulus hatred and practice to murther him: and ſo much prevailed he by his importunitie, that at laſt he perſwaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promiſing him that in ſo doing, he
C would give him both aid and aſſiſtance. Hircanus having debated upon theſe concluſions, at laſt thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined upon Jewry.) Whereupon he firſt of all ſent Antipater to Aretas, to take aſſurance of him that he ſhould not betray him into his enemies hands, if ſo be he ſhould ſubmit himſelf unto him, and require his aſſiſtance.

When as therefore Antipater had received this aſſurance from the King, he returned to Jeruſalem unto Hircanus: and not long after that took him away with him, and departed the Citie by night, and afterwards with great journeyes arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall Court. And for that he was inwardly familiar with the King, he beſought
D him to reeſtabliſh him in the kingdome of Jewrie, and wrought ſo much, as by his importunitie and the preſents which he gave him, that he perſwaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promiſed, that if he confirmed him again in his royall dignitie, he would upon the recovery of his Realm, reſtore unto him thoſe twelve Cities, which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are theſe that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Nariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, Oryba.

CHAP. III.

Aretas induced by theſe promiſes, was content to ſend forth an Army againſt Ariſtobulus, and himſelf in perſon conducted onward in that expedition fiftie thouſand men both on foot and horſe, and had the upper hand of his enemy in ſuch ſort, as divers after the attainment of this victory, of their own accord ſubmitted themſelves to Hircanus: and Ariſtobulus perceiving himſelf to be deſtitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jeruſalem. After him the King of Arabia led his Army with all expedition, and beſieged him in the Temple: In this ſiege the common people aſſiſted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Prieſts only that ſtuck to Ariſtobulus ſide. Whereupon Aretas marſhalled the forces he had, and buſily ſet the Army both of Jewes and Arabians about the ſiege.
F Whileſt theſe things were under theſe terms, the feaſt of unleavened bread, which we call the Paſſover, was at hand, and the Princes of the Jews forſaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (ſuch a one who for his vertue was beloved of God, and in times paſt had by his devout prayers and ſupplications in a time of drought, obtained rain from God) hid himſelf, perceiving that this ſedition would be ſome continuance. This man therefore being ſurpriſed and brought into the camp of the Jews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water; ſo at that time likewiſe he would by his imprecations incenſe God againſt Ariſtobulus, and his complices. But whereas he contradicted and excuſed himſelf, he was at laſt conſtrained by the people to perform their request; so that standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this manner: O God, King of the whole world, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy Priests, I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not hear them: and when as likewise they shall provoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them. Hereupon, a certain sort of reprobate souldiers amongst the Jews, hearing these words of his, stoned him to death: But God incontinently punished this cruelty in them; and the murther of Onias so cursedly perpetrated, was revenged by this means which ensueth. G

At such time as Aristobulus and the Priests were besieged, the feast of Easter or the Passeover fell out, during which time it was an usuall custome among the Jews to honour God with many sacrifices: Now for that they who were with Aristobulus, had not any beasts to offer up in sacrifice, they required the other Jews that were without, that they might have some delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was answered, that if they would give one thousand drachmes for every head, they should have some delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs, Aristobulus and the Priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let down the perfixed price, and delivered the same from the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, delivered them not those beasts which they required them to sell them for sacrifice, but so far were they given over to impietie, that they falsified their oaths not onely toward men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the Priests (being defrauded in this manner contrary to the oath and protestations of their adversaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their countrey-men, that had committed this hainous and perjurious impietie: neither did God defer their punishment any long time, but incontinently after he sent a great and violent wind, that spoyled all the fruits of the countrey; so that a measure of Wheat was sold for eleven drachmes. Hircanus and Aristobulus, send Embassadours to Scaurus, to covenant their peace with him.

MEan-while Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria (himself being in person detained in Armenia in pursuit of the warre betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came unto Damasco, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the citie; for which cause he marched onward towards Jewry: Where being arrived, certain Embassadours came unto him in the behalf of Aristobulus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacy in the behalf of them both, and offering in eithers respect a tribute of four hundred talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobulus promises, both for that he was a man of mightier substance and greater mind, and withall more moderate in his demand, whereas Hircanus was poor and covetous, and notwithstanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promise of less assurance: For it was a harder matter to subdue a Citie that was so defenced and strong, then to repulse a troup of runnagate Nabatheans, and they scarcely well animated to prosecute that warre. For these causes therefore he (receving his money) levied the siege, commanding Aretas to return; which if he refused, he declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damasco, and Aristobulus led forth his Army against Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and slew about some seven thousand of his enemies, amongst the number of which was Cephalius, Antipaters brother. How Aristobulus and Hircanus debate their titles in the presence of Pompey. M

NOt long time after this, Pompey came unto Damasco: and as he travelled thorow Cœlosyria, divers Embassadours resorted unto him from all parts of Syria, Egypt and Judæa. For Aristobulus sent him a present of great value, namely, a golden vine of five hundred talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in these words: There came an Embassadour out of Egypt, bearing a Crown of four thousand pieces of gold; and another from Jewry, with a vine or garden, and

A and the workmanſhip was called Terpole, that is to ſay, recreation: And this vine have we beheld at this day in the Citie of Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, having the inſcription of Alexander King of the Jewes; and it was eſteemed and valued at five hundred talents. It is ſaid that Ariſtobulus Prince of the Jews ſent the ſame. Straight after this, there came other freſh Ambaſſadors unto him (Antipater from Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus from Ariſtobulus) who accuſed thoſe that had taken money, namely, Gabinius, for that he firſt of all had received three hundred talents beſide other preſents: and ſecondly Scaurus, who had received four hundred; alleadging that by that means they had incenſed them againſt him. He therefore gave direction, that they ſhould repair unto him about the ſpring, each of them

B to juſtifie and maintain their ſeveral rights: as for himſelf he drew his forces from their wintering places, and marched towards Damaſco, deſtroying in his way a certain fortreſſe which Antiochus the Cyzicenian had fortified in Apamæa. He viſited alſo the countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus (who was a wicked and perverſe man, and no wayes differed from Dionyſius Tripolitane) who was puniſhed with the loſſe of his head, & was united alſo with him in friendſhip and affinity; yet acquitted of the death he deſerved, by the means of a thouſand talents ranſome, which Ptolomey diſtributed among his ſouldiers for their pay. He razed likewiſe the Caſtle of Lyſias (wherein a Jew called Sylas tyrannized) and paſſing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis, and having likewiſe aſcended the mountain (which is between them) he

C came to Cœloſyria; and from Pella repaired to Damaſco. In which place he gave audience to the Jewes, and their Princes Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, who were at ods the one againſt the other, as touching their particular intereſts, as all the whole nation againſt them both; alleadging that they would not be governed by Kings, becauſe their cuſtome was to obey Gods Prieſts, whom they honored, affirming that theſe two brethren (who were deſcended of the race of the Prieſts) ſought to draw their nation under a different form of government, to the intent to reduce them under ſervitude. Hyrcanus complained, for that being the elder born, he had been deprived of his inheritance by Ariſtobulus, and had onely but a ſmall portion of the countrey allotted him, becauſe Ariſtobulus had ſeized the reſt by force. He complained likewiſe of thoſe incurſions, that both by land and ſea Ariſtobulus followers

D had endamaged their frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accuſation of his, a thouſand of the principalleſt of the Jewes (drawn on by Antipaters perſwaſion) ſubſcribed, who averred and juſtified the ſame. But Ariſtobulus anſwered, that Hyrcanus was diſpoſſeſſed of the kingdom, by reaſon of his incapacity and natural defects; alleadging for himſelf, that the government was enforced on him by a neceſſity, for fear it ſhould be tranſported to others: in effect, he proteſted that he challenged no other Title, then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in alſo for his witneſſes certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple robes, their curioſity in painting and curling their hair, and bard horſe, and other braveries which they preſented, not like men that intended to expect judgement, but as if their pretence had been to make ſhew of their pomp. After that Pompey had heard them, he condem-

E ned Ariſtobulus violence, but for that time he diſmiſſed them (after ſome favourable and gracious conference) promiſing them that he would come into their countrey, and determine their differences, after he had ſeen the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the mean-while to live in peace. He uſed Ariſtobulus likewiſe very kindly, fearing leſt he ſhould incenſe the people, and ſhut up his paſſage which notwithſtanding came to paſſe. For Ariſtobulus came into the city of Delion, and from thence went into Judæa, without reſpect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

Pompey hearing this, was ſore diſpleaſed herewith; and taking with him his army which he had prepared againſt the Nabatheans (with the ſupplies he had in Damaſco, and the reſt of Syria, beſides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth againſt Ariſtobulus: When as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behind him, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Judæa) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Caſtle ſituate upon the top of a mountain called Alexandrion, whither Ariſtobulus was retired. For which cauſe he ſent Ambaſſadours to invite him to come and parley with him: who perſwaded by the counſel of many many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence warre against the Romans, came down unto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the kingdome, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. And this did he two or three times, alwayes flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the kingdom, and making a shew that he would be obedient unto him in whatsoever he would command. Mean-while he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the warre, for fear lest Pompey should transferre the kingdome to Hyrcanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliver up the fortresses that he held, and had written with his own hand to the Captains of the garrisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for warre. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certain messengers coming from Pontus, certified him of Mithridates death, who was slain by his son Pharnaces.

They of Jerusalem shut the gates against the Romanes.

WHen Pompey was encamped near unto Jericho (in which place there was a number of Date-trees, and where also groweth that balm which is the most precious of all other oyntments, distilling from a little shrub, which is opened & slit by a sharp cutting stone) the next morning he marched towards Jerusalem. At that time Aristobulus (being sorry for his misbehaviour) came unto him offering him money: and promising him to receive him into Jerusalem: he besought him, that (dismissing publike enmities and quarrels) he would peaceably do what him listed hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condescended to his request, and sent Gabinius with his souldiers, both to receive the money, as also to enter the City; but his purpose failed him in both: for Gabinius returned, because he was excluded out of the city; neither received he any money, for that Aristobulus souldiers would not permit that any promise should be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth; so that after he had committed Aristobulus to prison, he went in person against the City, which was strongly fortified on every side, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was easie to be beaten down: for this side is invironed with a large and deep valley, compassing the Temple, which is inclosed with a marvellous strong wall of stone.

CHAP. VIII.

Pompey taketh the Temple, and lower part of the City perforce.

BUt within the City, there grew a division and faction, by reason of the difference and dissident opinions of those that kept the same; for some thought good to yeeld up the City into Pompeys hands; other some (that were of Aristobulus faction) counselled that the gates should be kept shut, and preparation for war should be made, for that the Romanes detained Aristobulus prisoner. These latter prevailing more then the rest, seized the Temple; and breaking down the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, and addressed themselves to stand on their defence. But the others not onely delivered the City into Pompeys hands, but the royal Palace also: who sent Piso his Lieutenant thither with his forces to take possession thereof, and to plant his garrisons therein, and to fortifie the houses near adjoyning the Temple, and whatsoever convenient habitation without the walls. First therefore Piso offered the besieged certain conditions of peace: which for that they refused, he fortified and shut them in on every side, being in all these his endeavours assisted by Hyrcanus. On the outside of the City, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the temple (which was the easiest and meetest side to be assaulted) on this side also there were certain high towers, and a huge trench, besides a deep valley that begirt the temple. For towards the city all wayes and passages were so broken up, that no man could either go up or down, and the bridge was taken away on that side where Pompey was incampt. Each day did the Romans travel earnestly to raise a mount, and cutting down all the timber round about them, and having fitly applyed the same, the trench being fill'd up (although very hardly, by reason of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addressed, with which they inforced and darted stones against the Temple; and had not the ordinance of the countrey commanded to keep the Sabbath (which was the seventh day of the week) holy, and to labour in no sort on that day, the Romans had never been able to have raised their bulwork, if they within the Temple had

Pompey maketh preparation to besiege the Temple.

A had oppoſed themſelves againſt them. For the Law permitteth to defend themſelves againſt their enemies, at ſuch time as they are aſſailed and urged to fight, but not aſſaile them when they intend any other work. Which when the Romans underſtood, they neither gave aſſault, nor proffered skirmiſh on thoſe dayes, which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, and planted their engines; ſo that the next day they were ready to put them in uſe againſt the Jews. And hereby it is eaſie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how ſtudious and induſtrious they be in obſerving the Divine laws. For notwithſtanding any preſent or imminent fear, yet deſiſted they never to offer their ſolemn ſacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth hour, the Prieſts offered upon the Altar; and notwithſtanding any difficulty or danger of the ſiege that might happen, they omitted not the courſe of their oblations. For at ſuch time as the temple was taken (in B the third moneth, and on a faſting day, in the hundred ſeventy ninth Olympiade, in the year wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cirero were Conſuls) the enemy entred the temple by force, and ſlew thoſe that withſtood them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the Prieſts ceaſed not to exerciſe their accuſtomed ſacrifice: and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of thoſe that were dead, could force them to fly, but that they held it more convenient for them to endure all things that might happen in attending upon the Altar, then to tranſgreſſe or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may ſeem to be no fable or praiſe of their diſſembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all thoſe that write the Hiſtories concerning Pompey and his acts, do witneſſe no leſſe: amongſt the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Hiſtoriographer, the moſt
C famous among the reſt. The greateſt of theſe towers was battered by theſe engines, and fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it which was the cauſe that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The firſt that aſcended the wall, was Cornelius Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla, with his ſouldiers. After him mounted the Centurian Furius, accompanied with thoſe that followed him, on the other ſide; and thorow the midſt of the breach, did the Centurion Fabius enter with a ſtrong ſquadron. The whole circuit was filled with murthers; and ſome of the Jewes died by the Romanes ſwords; otherſome ſlew one another; the reſt caſt themſelves down headlong from the ſteepie places: many likewiſe ſet fire on their houſes, and conſumed themſelves therein, for fear they ſhould behold the execu-
D tions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelve thouſand Jewes, and very few Romans. Abſalom alſo, who was Ariſtobulus father in law and uncle, was taken priſoner. The religion of the Temple likewiſe was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the temple, Pompey and divers others that accompanied him, entred the ſame, and ſaw that which was not lawful to be beheld by any other but the high Prieſts onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a ſacred candleſtick, with divers other veſſels and odoriferous drugs in great quantity; and wheras beſides that, there were about two thouſand talents of ſilver in the ſacred treaſury in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reverence he had of GOD; and herein he behaved himſelf anſwerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded E thoſe that had the charge of the Temple, to purge the ſame, and to offer ſacrifices unto God, according to the law; committing the high Prieſthood to Hyrcanus hands, both for that he had ſtood him in great ſtead in many things, as for that he had hindred the Jews, that were of the countrey, from joyning themſelves with Ariſtobulus. After this, he beheaded the authours of this warre, and honoured Fauſtus and the reſt with condigne gifts, who with great courage had firſt attempted and aſcended the wall. As for Jeruſalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jewes thoſe Cities they had conquered in Cœloſyria, & aſſigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this he incloſed the nation within certain limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this he repaired Gadara, that not long before was deſtroyed; all which he performed in fa-
F vour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late ſervant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azot, Jamnia, and Arethuſa, he reſtored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were ſituate in the heart of the land: Beſides, Gaſa, Joppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton (cities ſituate upon the ſea-coaſt, and ruinated beforetime with divers wars) he ſet at liberty, and annexed them unto the province. After that Pompey had given Cœlosyria to Scaurus, from Euphrates as far as to the frontiers of Egypt, with two legions of the Romans; he went into Cilicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Aristobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two sons, and two daughters) one of which called Alexander, escaped by flight; and as touching Antigonus (who was the younger) he was led to Rome with his sisters.

Who being sent Ambassadour to Aretas from Scaurus, in that he had sometimes sojourned with him, perswaded him to contribute a certain summe of silver to warrantize his countrey from pillage; and he himself also became pledge for three hundred talents. Castles fortified.

NOt long after this, Alexander Aristobulus son, made divers inroads into Jewry: for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which he atchieved) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hyrcanus had not as yet sufficient power to resist him, being otherwise exercised in building the walls of Jerusalem that were beaten down by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were in Jewry hindred him from performing the same. This Alexander travelling thorow the whole countrey, assembled divers Jewes; so that in short time, having gotten together 10000. footmen, and fifteen hundred horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion near unto the City of Coreas. He fortified Machæron also in the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, having sent before him Marcus Antonius accompanied with other Chieftains of war, who armed the Romans of their train, and the Jewes that were under their obedience, whose Captains were Pitholaus and Malichus. They took also those allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage came they to make head against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his troopes. Hereupon Alexander drew more near with his army towards Jerusalem, where waging battel with the Romans, he lost about three thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and invited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And whereas many of his enemies had encamped themselves before the Fort, the Romans charged them; in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adjudged to have behaved himself very valiantly, in that he slew divers of his enemies. Gabinius left a part of his army in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof, he might go and visit the countrey of Judæa; he commanded therefore all those Cities, which in his journey he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired: for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with divers others, were new builded: so that through the obedience that was given to Gabinius command, it came to passe that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had laine long time before desart.

Whilest therefore he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Ambassadors unto him demanding pardon at his hand for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of Hyrcania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion; which Gabinius levelled with the ground. And whereas Alexanders mother came unto him (who favoured the Roman

A man faction, and whose husband and children were kept in prison in Rome) she obtained all that which she requested at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly disposed of her affairs, he led Hircanus to Ierusalem to take charge of the Temple and Priesthood. He ordained also five judgment seats and places of session, and divided the province into answerable parts: for the one answered in Ierusalem; the second at Gadara; the third in Amatha; the fourth at Iericho; and the fifth at Saphora; which is a town of Galilee. By this means the Iews were delivered of their Monarchie, and lived under an Aristocracie, or government of the Nobilitie.

B Aristobulus escapeth out of prison, and flieth from Rome, and is apprehended again by Gabinius in Judaa, and led back prisoner to Rome.

BUt Aristobulus flying from Rome, returned to Iewrie, and determined to re-edifie the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruinated. Against him Gabinius sent out certain men of warre with their Captains, namely Sisenna, Antonius and Servilius, both to keep him from the possession of the place, as to apprehend and surprize him likewise. For many Iews resorted unto him, being drawn thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had: who desired likewise to work innovations. Pitholaus also (who was established Lieutenant Generall in Ierusalem) of his owne accord came unto him, with a thousand men well armed; but the other that were retired within, for the most C part were not sufficiently furnished with Arms; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Machæron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed, and were unapt for any execution, and retaining onely eight thousand well armed men, he took the field and marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and overtaking him, fought desperately with him, and overcame both him and his, notwithstanding their valiant resistance. Being therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, and about five thousand of them were slain; and the rest dispersed, wandring here and there, sought for their own private securities: but Aristobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thousand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affairs had very slender succes; yet lost he not his hope: but after he had endured the siege some two dayes, and received many wounds, he was taken prisoner, D and with his sonne Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away captive by Gabinius. Such was the adventure of Aristobulus, that he was sent prisoner back again to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had been King and high Priest three yeers and six moneths. A man in that dignitie both magnificent and magnanimous: yet did the Senate send back his children (according to the tenor of Gabinius letters) who had promised their delivery to their mother, at such time as she surrendred the Castles into his hands; whereupon they returned into Iewry. But Gabinius, intending to make warre against the Parthians, and having already past Euphrates, changed his resolution, and determined to return into Egypt, and re-establish Ptolomey, as it is declared in another place. In this expedition also he was furnished by Antipaters means, with victuals, money and munition; and by his advice, those Iews E that inhabite Peleusium (who kept as it were the very entrie into Egypt) were drawn into his societie. When as therefore Gabinius returned back out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult and rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus son, taking once more possession of the kingdom, caused divers Iews from day to day to revold; and forraging the countrey with a huge Army, he slew all those Romans whom he met withall, and besieged all those that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinius seeing the affairs of Syria in that estate, sent Antipater before him unto them to appease these commotions, and to heal them of their franzie, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was a man of good discretion. In effect, he repairing unto them, moderated divers of them, and brought them under obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander, for he having thirty thousand F souldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was overcome, with the loss of some ten thousand of his men, neer unto the mount Itabyr.

Crassus going against the Pharthians, passeth by Iudæa, and robbeth the sacred treasure.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 13. al. 14. Marcus Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians, taketh the treasure out of the Temple of Jerusalem.

Crassus intending to make warre against the Parthians, came into Jewry, and took away with him the sacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the sum 2000. talents:) He spoiled the Temple also of all the gold that was in the same, to the summe of 8000. talents. Furthermore, he bare away a wedge of solid gold, to the weight of three hundreth pounds, which pound amongst the Jews containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that delivered him this ingot was a Priest, and the keeper of the sacred treasure, called Eleazar, who gave him the same upon no malicious intent (for he was a vertuous and just man) but, whereas he had the custodie of the tapestries of the Temple committed to his hands (which were both admirable to behold, by reason of their beauty and esteeme, and withall were in like sort tied and fastned to his beame) and perceiving that Crassus sought all the means that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing lest he should have seized on all the ornaments of the Temple, gave him this beame for a ransome to redeeme all the rest: binding him upon the delivery thereof by an oath, that he should not take any thing away that was in the Temple, but should content himself with that onely piece of great esteeme and value, which he gave him. This beam was inclosed in another hollow beam of wood; so that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Crassus therefore took this beam, as if he determined to leave all other things in the Temple; yet notwithstanding he falsified his oath, and carried away whatsoever was therein. Neither is it to be wondred at, that there was so great riches found in our Temple, sith all those Jews that were dispersed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all those that feared God (both in Asia and in Europe) for a long time offered their presents in that place. The greatnes and multitude whereof wanteth no testimony: neither is it fained in way of ostentat ion but divers other Historians make mention thereof: and amongst the rest, Strabo of Cappadocia speaketh after this manner: "And Mithridates sent men into the Ile of Coos, to fetch from thence the "money that Queen Cleopatra had laid up there, and 800. talents of the Jews. But we have no publike money, but that which is dedicated unto God. It is therefore a thing most manifest, that the Jews that inhabit Asia, transported this money into Coos for the fear they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they, who inhabited Judæa, and had a Citie so strong, and a Temple so well defenced, should send their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewise, that the Jews remaining in Alexandria should doe it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this war of Mithridates. The same Strabo also saith in another place, that at such time as Sylla passed thorow Greece to make warre against Mithridates and Lucullus, he sent men unto Cyrene, which was troubled by reason of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and saith thus.

Crassus breaketh his oath. Whence the Temple of Jerusalem grew so rich.

Straba of Cappadocia.

There were foure sorts of people in the Citie of the Cyrenians: One of them were Citizens; the second were Labourers, the third were Sojourners; and the fourth were Jews, who at this present are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, neither was there any nation that inhabit the same, wherein these have not set foot and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being under the subjection of the same Princes) and divers other regions, conformed themselves to their customes, and nourished assemblies of Jews, and advanced them, and more and more used the Jewish ordinances. It appeareth therefore that there was a colony of Jews in Egypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the city is assigned to this nation. They have likewise their peculiar magistrate, who governeth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if he governed in his own common-weale. By this means this nation hath fortified and established it selfe in Egypt, for that the Jews had their originall amongst the Egyptians, and for that Judæa is neer unto Egypt, from whence the Jews are descended: And as touching Cyrene, they have entred it, in that it confineth that countrey, which is under the obedience of the Egyptians (in like manner as Judæa doth) or rather for that in times past it appertained to the same Kingdome. Thus farre Strabo.

Crassus slain in Parthia. Cassius resisteth the Parthians,

After that Crassus had disposed all things according to his own pleasure, he dislodged and marched forward to make war against the Parthians, where both he and all his army were destroyed (as it is declared in another place.) As for Cassius, he retired himself into Syria, and took possession thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians; who being proud of their victory

A victory lately obtained, made excurſions ſo far: and coming to Tyre, he finally arrived in Judæa, whereupon his firſt entrance he took the city of Tarichæa, and led away from thence thirty thouſand priſoners. He put Pitholaus alſo to death, for that he maintained Ariſtobulus faction. This Antipater alſo made alliance with other Princes, and eſpecially with the Arabian, to whoſe cuſtody he committed his children, during the time he made war againſt Ariſtobulus. AFter Pompeys death, and that victory which Cæſar had obtained againſt him, Antipater (Governour of Judæa by the commandement of Hyrcanus) was very profitable unto Cæſar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certain ſupplies, and could not bring them on, by reaſon of an arme of Nilus paſſing thorow Pelu-

The conflict of the Egytians with Mithridates at Delta. Alias cap. 18.

WHen he was come to a place called Delta, he fought with the enemies in a place which is called The camp of the Jews: in which battel Mithridates led the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handy blows, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfitted, had not Antipater (runing with his souldiers along the bank of the river) obtained the upper hand of his enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were conquerors to flight, and restoring Mithridates. And so long pursued he them, that he got their camp, and called back Mithridates, who chased the Egyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that he had recovered from the fugitive enemy. In this fight there fell 800. on the enemies side, and 50. on Antipaters. Afterwards, Mithridates wrote hereof unto Cæsar, and certified him that Antipater was the cause of the victory, & their preservation: so that Cæsar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his war made he use of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts: Whereby it came to passe that Antipater was grievously wounded in divers fights.

Mithridates commendeth Antipaters service to Cæsar.

Now after that the war was finished, Cæsar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hyrcanus, to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Divers men report that Hyrcanus himself was an agent in this war, and that he came into Egypt; whereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, speaking after this manner by the authority of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entred Egypt, with Hyrcanus the high Priest of the Jews. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authority of Hypsicrates, that Mithridates issued alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared three thousand souldiers, because he was governour of Judæa, and encouraged the rest of the Governours; and Hyrcanus the high Priest also had a part in this war. Thus far Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus son, to Cæsar, lamenting unto him the inconvenience that had befalne his father, and how he was slain by poyson in his service, and how his brother had his head strooken off by Scipio; beseeching him to have compassion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the kingdome. He accused Hyrcanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannical and violent government over their nation, and injuries offered to himself. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himself in those points wherein he was accused: declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himself how much he had travelled, and how many exploits he had executed in the late warre, whereof Cæsar himself was a witnesse. Moreover, he avowed that Aristobulus had been justly led twice into captivity to Rome, for that he had been alwayes an enemy, and no wayes well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he averred that he was justly punished by him, for his Latrocinies, and not injuriously and outragiously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hyrcanus high Priest, and gave Antipater any government whatsoever best him liked: who according to his choice, was appointed Prætect in Judæa.

Cæsars Letters, and the Senates Decree as touching their amity with the Jewes.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 17 al. 18. Hyrcanus by Cæsars permission repaireth the walls of Jerusalem The Senates Decree as touching their league with the Jewes.

MOreover, Cæsar permitted Hyrcanus to repair the walls of Jerusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten them down, they lay levelled with the earth; and he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that this Decree should be registred in the Capitol. The example of which ordinance of the Senate containeth matter to this effect; Lucius Vaderius, the sonne of Lucius the Prætor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the Temple of concord the thirteenth day of December) in the presence of L. Caponious the sonne of Lucius, and Cajus Papyrius Quirinus; the requests made by Alexander the son of Jason, Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Alexander the son of Dorotheus, Ambassadors in the behalf of the Jewes, men of good regard, and our allies, and proposed by them in renewing the ancient favours they have received from the Romans; and in testimony of the confederation; have brought us a vial and buckler of gold

A "gold of fiftie thousand crowns price; requiring our letters might be given them, addressed "to the free cities, and the Kings our confederates, to grant them passage thorow their coun- "treyes and ports with all securitie, and without any offence. And we have thought good "to make friendship and alliance with them, and to grant them all that which they require, "in accepting the buckler brought by them. This hapned in the time that Hircanus was "high Priest and Prince, and in the ninth yeer of his Princedom, in the moneth of July.

Hircanus was in like sort honoured by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendships that they received at his hands. They sent him also a Decree which they ratified in his behalf, the tenour whereof ensueth: "The yeer wherein Dionysius the son of B "Asclepiades was Governour, and Priest, in the moneth of July, and on the 20. day this arrest "or decree of the Athenians was delivered to the Governours by the Prætor Agathocles. Since that Hircanus the son of Alexander, the high Priest and Prince of "the Jewes, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in speciall towards "every citizen of Athens, and hath shewed them many friendships, receiving with all hu- "manitie those Athenians that come unto him, whether they resort thither as Embassadors,

It is likewise decreed, that amongst all the Athenians, there "be certain Embassadours chosen, who shall bear this Decree unto him, and exhort him to do "whatsoever is profitable for our common good, seeing himself so much honoured by us. Let this suffice to expres the honours bestowed on Hircanus by the people of Rome, "and the Citizens of Athens.

Hircanus honoured by the Athenians.

After that Cæsar had given order for the affairs of Syria, he returned back by Sea. And as soon as Antipater had brought Cæsar out of Syria, he returned into Judæa, and suddenly builded up the wals which were before time defaced by Pompey; & in riding circuit about the Countrey, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces; but by Counsels also which he
E gave every one to live in peace; certifying them that if they submitted themselves to Hircanus their Prince, they should live happily, and enjoy their possessions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to advance themselves by any new commotion (supposing by that means to profit themselves some way) they should feel that in stead of a Governour, they had a Master; and in stead of a King, they should find Hircanus a Tyrant; and instead of the Romans and Cæsar to be their Governours, they should feel and find them to be their most hatefull enemies, for that they would not suffer, that any thing should be altered that they had established. By these and such like admonitions, he kept and continued all the countrey in peace.

Antipater committeth the government of Galilee to his sonne Herod, and that of Jerusalem to Phasælus his other son: and how Sextus Cæsar advanceth Herod to great honours and dignities.

Antipater perceiving that Hircanus was slow and idle, he declared and appointed Phasælus his eldest sonne governour over Jerusalem, and the countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for he was not at that time above fifteen yeers old) he committed Galilee unto his charge: who although he were young in yeers, yet did not his tender age any way prejudice him, because he was of a noble spirit, and found out this
